RAILROAD DISASTER.

A Train on the Canadian Grand Trunk Wrecked — Twenty-three Killed and Forty-two Fatally Injured — Awful Scenes of Suffering.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

BELLEVILLE, Ontario, June 22.—The citizens of this town are very much excited to-day in consequence of a dreadful accident occurring on the Grand Trunk Railway, a few miles below, and the disaster makes the more sensation because it is the first that has occurred on this division of the road since the line opened in 1856.

There is a night express train that leaves Toronto at 6:10 P. M., and runs through direct to Montreal, passing this station at midnight, and being a mixed train, is usually patronized by emigrants and persons going long distances. The train arrived here safely and in apparent good order at 12:05, and, after a brief stoppage, proceeded down the line at 12:10. It consisted of one express and baggage car, two second-class cars, two first-class and a Pullman car, and was under the care of HENRY NELSON, conductor, of this place.

No thought of danger was entertained, and the train went along at a thundering speed, until it reached Frenchman's Creek, a desolate and uninhabited region near Mallorytown, a way-station on the road, about eleven miles from Belleville and four miles below Shannonville, where the disaster occurred.

The locomotive suddenly, and without warning, jumped the track, in consequence of a defective rail, as is supposed. The baggage-car became detached from the tender, and the impetus of the passenger-cars caused the two second-class coaches to become telescoped by it, the engine meanwhile falling over on its side, while the passenger-cars came up alongside of it, standing on the rails.

None of the first-class passengers sustained serious injury, and as soon as the terror and confusion subsided, they proceeded bravely to work in the endeavor to rescue the unfortunate men, women and children who were writhing in torture in the telescoped cars. Openings were speedily made by means of crowbars, and a few persons extricated, though the majority were jammed in by the shattered timbers, the escaping steam from the wrecked locomotive adding to their terrible sufferings.

The scene was a most heart-rending one, and words fail to convey an idea of the incidents that transpired, and none of the survivors seem able to give any coherent description. News of the disaster soon reached Shannonville, when Mr. JOHN BAKER, the telegraph operator and station-master, proceeded to the scene, accompanied by Dr. ROUSE HOLMES, Dr. THOMSDALE, and other leading residents of the village, when they gave all the assistance in their power. In this good work they were soon afterward joined by residents of this town, among whom were Mayor Flint, Drs. D. E. Burdett, James Lister, P. V. Doriand, Wm. Jarvis, Superintendent of the Second Division Grand Trunk Railway; Capt. Nunn, formerly the Belleville Station-master; E. L. Benjamin, Custom-house officer; Col. Alfred Campbell, Col. James Brown, Member of Parliament; Major M. Bowell, Member of Parliament; Police Magistrate H. Diamond, besides many others. Several platform cars were run down to the spot by the aid of the locomotive which carried down the accommodation-train. These cars were amply provided with mattresses and other appliances for the relief of the sufferers.

Despite this aid, which was accorded as early as possible, the unfortunate victims lay in their agony at the scene of the disaster for nearly four hours, and when the rescue party did arrive they found five dead, sixty injured in a most dreadful way, and nearly twenty were able to move about despite their hurts.

Before daylight all of the dead, dying and wounded had been removed to this station, the large freight shed near the depot being turned into an impromptu hospital. The residences in the immediate neighborhood were also placed at the disposal of the lesser injured. Ladies came forward with sheets and old linen, which were speedily torn into bandages, and the surgeons did everything in their power to alleviate the sufferings of their patients. The railroad officials were very active, and Mr. HAYDENS, the General superintendent of the Grand Trunk, telegraphed orders from the main office in Montreal to have everything done for the comfort of the sufferers at the expense of the Company.

As soon as some of the wounded had died in great agony, having inhaled steam and being scalded by the broken cars. By 7 o'clock this evening there were twelve more deaths reported, and the physicians state that scarcely any of the sixty-five seriously injured can live.

The accident, next to that which occurred at the Desjardines Canal, between Hamilton and Toronto, in the first year of the road's operations, is connected in most disastrous results that ever took place in Canada, and the event has sent a thrill of horror through the entire Dominion.

KILLED AND WOUNDED.

JOHN HIBBERT, the engineer, was instantly killed, and the fireman badly injured; one of his legs will have to be amputated. H. NELSON, the conductor, who resides in Belleville, and other train hands, escaped uninjured. The wounded and dying are lying stretched on mattresses on the floor of the freight shed, so much disfigured as to be unrecognizable by friends.

Two of the wounded who were able to walk left by the express-train at 11 A. M. for Toronto.

The following names have been obtained: John Hibbert, engineer, killed; Thomas Kidd, fireman, leg amputated; John Nelson and Mary Ann Nelson, his wife, of No. 24 Kemp-street, Montreal, the husband is severely wounded and supposed to be dying; the wife was also severely injured; Mrs. Hendershot severely scalded about the hands and face; Mr. and Mrs. Callender, of Kingston, both severely scalded; Mr. Callender has since died; W. D. Lee, merchant, of Longueil, severely scalded; Thomas Morrison, Esq., of Montreal, severely injured; Miss Hopson, badly scalded; M. F. Frank, of Guelphurn, severely scalded; John Wood, of Fademham, severely scalded; Walter Hopkins, of Toronto, scalded on hands and head; Narcisse Bisin, of Quebec, severely scalded and otherwise injured about the head; Baptiste Lovoie and Delphine Lavoie, his wife, of St. Collazer, near Montreal, both severely injured; injuries are not serious, but the wife is so severely scalded that she cannot survive many hours. J. McLowran, of Glengarry, is missing, and is supposed to be among the dead; Kennedy McLoyran, his brother, is severely scalded; Thomas Hard, of Exeter, severely scalded about the face; Edward Reed, of Montreal, severely scalded and leg broken; Porter Garreau, of Quebec, badly scalded; Moses Goins, of La Prairie, scalded on hands and body; Francis Rivers, of Quebec, hands and legs badly scalded; Joseph Pilon, of Quebec, is missing, but never known to be badly injured, as he was the most valiant; Michael Cavens, of Toronto, boy fourteen years old, severely scalded on hands and received contusion on the head; Peter Bugin, severely scalded; died since morning. Mrs. Nelson is also dead since morning. R. Stout, of Pendleton; Thomas Hall, of Hamilton, severely scalded; Joseph Tremay, of Quebec; Jean Jean, of Quebec; Xavier Lecessere, of Ventrevill; Narcisse Fainguere, of Three Rivers, and James Chevrier, all badly scalded. Mrs. Chevrier has since died. Mrs. Lefebvre, of Quebec, scalded; Mr. Lefebvre, of Quebec, severely scalded; Mr. Gauvreau, of Quebec, severely scalded; Mr. Mercier, of the Bank, Montreal, severely scalded; Mrs. Mercier, severely scalded; Mrs. Lavoie, severely scalded. Mr. Lavoie was also severely scalded. An Government official from Quebec was also severely scalded; Michael Bain, of Point Levi; Narcisse Blanet, of Quebec; Charles Nadeau, of Toronto; Gaspe Campte, of Quebec; Adelina Montpelier, of Vandreuil; Donald Cameron, of Cumberland; John McDonald, of Cumberland; Peter Wright, of Montreal, Mrs. John Mallonay, of First Concession; Kunyon Lochiel, of Quebec; Mr. Tremblay, of St. Urbain; Andre Fournier, of Cocesu Landing; Anne Dumais, of St. Lambert, near Quebec; Larry Richard, of Vaudreuil; John Zoneau, of Vaudreuil; Joseph Bellair, of Vaudreuil; Vanah Malone, of Beauharnais; Vaseau Cardinal, of St. Silicite; Isaac Dauber, of Quebec; W. Richard, of Vaudreuil; Geolis Minors, of St. Bellaire, east of Quebec; Francois La Blance, of St. Taurez; Pierre Richer, of Cornechuna; George Lessard, of Riviere Ouelle, and Mrs. Hogg, of Kingston, died before noon. One man refused to give his name for fear that his wife should hear it. There are six dead whose names have not been ascertained; also there are some four or five of those who are frightfully injured, and whose names are not obtained in the list.

The most wounded were all second-class passengers. The first-class all escaped uninjured.

TERRIBLE EXPLOSION.

Disastrous Fire in Liberty-street — Explosion of Chemicals Starting the Flames — Eighteen Firemen Seriously Injured — The Wounded.

A terrible catastrophe occurred yesterday morning at the chemical laboratory of GEO. A. ERKENBRACH, located on the first floor of the five-story brick building, Nos. 18 and 20 Liberty-street, resulting in fearful injuries to no fewer than twenty persons, several of whom, it is feared, will not survive their injuries. With but two exceptions the injured are members of the Fire Department.

The basement of the building is occupied as a dinner saloon by FRANZ WIETZEN, of No. 20 Bond-street. Shortly after 6 o'clock yesterday morning, CHAS. BALDAUF, a nephew of Mr. WIETZEN, who is employed in the place, arrived at the building, and opened the basement. Soon after the cook, CATHARINE BROWN, a German girl, residing at No. 37 Rose-street, started a fire in the range in the kitchen, which is situated in the extreme rear end of the building. At about 6¼ o'clock, Mr. WIETZEN, the proprietor of the restaurant, made his appearance, and in a few minutes BALDAUF noticed some highly-colored and strong-smelling stuff dropping through the boarded ceiling of the basement from the floor of the store above. The stuff, which was doubtless some powerful acid, had a peculiar odor, and as it stained everything it touched, several large dishpans were procured and placed under the spot where the dripping occurred to catch the stuff and prevent its spreading all over the place. This dropping at once continued but a short time when small jets of smoke were noticed curling through the interstices between the planks of the ceiling, indicating that the store above was on fire. Mr. WIETZEN ascended to the sidewalk and examined the doors and windows of the store and found them securely fastened. He gave no alarm at that time, but scarcely had he returned to the basement when an explosion occurred, forcing down a portion of the ceiling and setting the basement on fire. WIETZEN cried to BALDAUF and the cook to come out, and then rushed to the street. He was compelled to take his way through a volumes of flame before he could reach the sidewalk, and was very seriously burned about the head, face and hands. CATHARINE BROWN had to pass through the same ordeal, and was also badly burned about the hands and face. BALDAUF appeared to be in the rear yard at the time of the explosion, and made his way into the street through the hallway of an adjoining building and escaped without injury.

The explosion alarmed the neighborhood, and the members of Engine Company No. 4, stationed in Liberty-street, near Nassau-street, proceeded promptly to the scene of the accident, and made their way at the same time past an alarm which brought several other steamers and hook and ladder trucks to the spot. Under the direction of District Engineer JAS. H. MORRON, the doors of the store were forced open and two steamers (Nos. 4 and 6) were in a few moments directed against the flames. When the doors were forced open, the whole interior of the store was found to be in flames. The fire was gaining rapid headway, and the members of Hook and Ladder Companies Nos. 10 and 1 were ordered into the building to cut out and force open the rear windows, so as to allow the dense volume of smoke which was pouring from the firemen to escape. While the firemen were in the store exerting themselves to the utmost to check the spread of the flames, a second explosion occurred, much more violent and destructive than the first. In a moment, without any previous warning, a great body of flame shot from the spot where the explosion occurred, and the firemen, thrown down and almost blinded by the force of the explosion, were terribly burned before they could escape into the street. Unfortunately the doors of the store were closed by the force of the explosion, and the unfortunate firemen found themselves shut in from which they were unable to extricate themselves. The firemen who remained in the street promptly rushed to the rescue of their suffering comrades, and in their exertions to bring forth from a dying death their unfortunate colleagues they were ably seconded by a detachment of Police under Capt. WARD, Doorman and Sergeant GARVIN of the First Precinct. The doors of the store were again forced open, and the burned and maimed firemen were brought out into the light and air to the number of eighteen. The scene at this time became a perfect pandemonium. Notwithstanding the early hour, a large crowd of curious spectators, among whom were a great many women, had gathered about the spot and the excitement was so great that they broke in the lines formed by the Police, and crowded about the sufferers as they were brought out from the burning stairs and carried into the adjoining buildings. The ambulances were on the ground, and bruised firemen were echoed by the sympathizing crowd, who were wrought up to a state of fearful excitement by the sight of their terrible sufferings. Scores of men and women rushed about, seeking for old and old friends. The confusion and wounds of the sufferers. Ambulances were telegraphed for, and Drs. AMMERMAN and BRUCE were promptly on the spot with the ambulances from the Park Hospital. Those most seriously injured were taken to the hospital in the ambulances, and the others were placed on tenderly by friends in carriages and hacks. Information of the fire was at once sent to the Police Hospital. Dr. VANDEWATER, the house surgeon, took charge of the wounded men as they were brought in, and, aided by Dr. AMMERMAN and Bruce and Warden BROWN, did all in their power to relieve the terrible sufferings of the unfortunate firemen. Several physicians and "cabs of the Police surgeons upon board of the ambulance, hastened to the hospital and volunteered their aid, which was gladly accepted.

The following is a list of those who received attention at the Park Hospital:

DISTRICT ENGINEER JAMES H. MORRON, terribly burned about the face, hand and arms.

ENGINE COMPANY NO. 4.

Foreman JOHN BAUTZENER, badly burned about the body and severely cut across the right knee.

Pipemen C. W. BAKER, DENNIS BAKER, FRED J. CARUSOS and JOHN DONOHUE.

ENGINE COMPANY NO. 6.

Foreman PATRICK DONOGHE, Assistant Foreman JOHN HARRIS, and Privates WM. KLINE, EDWARD BURKE, FRANCIS MURRAY and THOMAS HYDE.

HOOK AND LADDER COMPANY NO. 10.

Foreman JAMES H. HOWE and Privates PATRICK CALLAHAN, JOHN MCNAMARA, LOUIS SCHLAM and JOHN SCHWAB.

Private John Finn, of Hook and Ladder No. 1, was fractured and badly bruised.

FRANZ WIETZEN, proprietor of the restaurant and dinner saloon, and CATHARINE BROWN, the cook employed there, were also taken to Park Hospital, and after having their injuries attended to, were taken to their homes.

Engineer MORRON is so badly injured that it is feared he cannot survive. After his wounds were dressed, he was at his own request taken to his home, No. 127 Franklin-street. He is a young man and was considered a most faithful and valuable officer. He is married and has several children.

Foreman BAUTZENER, of Engine No. 6, in addition to being terribly burned, was blown out of a rear window and received a severe wound across the knee and several contusions. He was prostrated by the heat from the bombshell. Mr. BAUTZENER has been a member of the Fire Department since its organization.

Firemen DENNIS REGAN and J. J. COFFINOE, of Engine No. 6; Assistant Foreman JOHN HARRIS, and Firemen KLINE, BURKE, MURRAY and HYDE, of Engine No. 6, and Private MCNAMARA of Hook and Ladder No. 10, were somewhat the most seriously injured, and it is feared that several of them will succumb to the shock of their injuries. Owing to the overcrowded state of the Park Hospital, the less wounded were removed to Bellevue Hospital. The other injured firemen, after having their wounds properly dressed, were taken to their homes in carriages. The surgeons in attendance at the hospital pronounced the injuries of the firemen to be generally severe, and that they will be compelled to remain under the care of physicians for some days.

A reporter visited the hospital at 9 o'clock this morning, to ascertain the condition of the injured firemen. He found all of the men quite comfortable, considering the serious character of their injuries, and the perseverance in answering the questions of the reporter notwithstanding the pain they must have suffered. Though severely bruised, it is thought that all will be permanently disabled from doing active duty for a few days.

An Oil Tank of Nearly the Dimensions of Franklin Tanks Fires — Loss $15,000 — One Man Injured.

Yesterday afternoon, at about 4 o'clock, a tank of petroleum in the lamproom of the steamer Franklin, of the Baltic line, stranded at Pier No. 41 East River, setting fire to the woodwork adjoining. Two men were at work in the room at the time, and it is supposed that the gas from the escape-pipe of the tank of kerosene took fire and exploded, upon contact with the flame of a lamp. The alarm was given, and the fire spread rapidly, and two steam-pumps and one hand-pump on the steamer were called into requisition. These were found insufficient, and the fire-alarm brought several engines from the City Department, with the aid of which the flames were checked in a short time. The wood-work and the machinery and engine were badly burned, and the total loss cannot prove less than $15,000. The Franklin is fully insured. She was expected to sail for Boston next Saturday, but the opportunity is lost. The building is owned by Messrs. Funk, and is considerably damaged by the disaster. She had no cargo of consequence in at the time of the burning. WENDT & HAMELS, the agents of the line, were promptly on hand to make arrangements for the repairing. HENRY LARR, one of the men in the lamp-room at the time of the explosion, was severely injured.

Fire and Loss of Life in Chicago.

CHICAGO, Ill., June 22.—A fire broke out about 2 o'clock this morning in a restaurant on the lower floor of No. 12 South Water-street. The Fire Patrol and a corps of men employed by the underwriters were first to arrive on the scene, and just as several of them entered the burning building the gas-meter exploded. DAVID BONNELLY, who has relatives in Philadelphia, and J. PATTERSON were burned to death, and three other persons were badly, but not fatally, injured. The building is entirely destroyed, and the second floor occupied as a cigar factory. The loss on the stock is about $10,000, and on the building probably as much more.

WASHINGTON NOTES.

A Trade-Mark Treaty Special Changes in the Army — Weekly Currency Statement.

WASHINGTON, June 22.—The Trade-marks Convention between the United States and the Austro-Hungarian Empire has been proclaimed by the President, and will take effect from the 23d day of July, to continue in force for ten years. THE STRIKERS.

No Change in the Situation of Affairs.

Circular from the Wire Manufacturers — The Introduction of Machinery by a Brooklyn House Resented — A Few Words Daily Rather.

The only noticeable statement of yesterday presented no decided features of importance, either of progress or retrogression. The public mind was unquiet, and the usual meetings and their results were discussed, but there was no change in the situation. The weather was very favorable for meetings, being cool, and quite pleasant.

The iron and metal workers held a meeting in the Germania Assembly Rooms. A large number of workers were present. The strike men on machines were given $2 per week, and the married men fifty cents additional for each child in his family.

CARMEN'S men met in Walhalla Hall. Relief was given to those needing it.

It was stated that the Associated Society of Workingmen and Mechanics of the United States and Canada had placed its fund at the disposal of the men on strike for eight hours.

FERDINAND LUTLERS, FREDERICK RUNG, and ALBERT KROHN, workers in a sugar refinery in Washington-street, were yesterday found guilty, at the Court of Special Sessions, of assaulting FREDERICK BOEHM, because he refused to join them in a strike, and had sentence suspended. Justice SHANDLEY remarked if they came before him again on a similar charge they would be severely punished.

The sugar refiners are returning to work upon the eight-hour system in New-York, Brooklyn and Jersey City, but few shops are still closed.

The following is a circular addressed by the wire-work and wire railing manufacturers to their men:

NEW-YORK, June 22, 1872.

We, the undersigned, Wire Railing and Wire-work Manufacturers, having conferred with the leading spokesmen of a number of hours constituting a day's work, being equal to an advance of twenty per cent. on the wages now paid to them, we do hereby agree to pay to our men the same rate of wages for nine hours' work as we now pay them for ten hours' work, and to continue the present rate of wages for nine hours' work for the space of one year from the first day of July next. And we further agree that we will not discriminate against any man on account of his connection with the movement of May last, but will employ all our former hands as fast as there is work for them to do, and that we shall take immediate measures to fill all vacancies that may occur in our shops. And we further agree that we will not employ any man who refuses to work nine hours per day for the wages herein agreed to.

JOHN A. ROPER, No. 9 Park-place.
JAMES HOPKINS, No. 97 Broadway.
J. WOOLLEY, No. 9 Park-place.
HALL & MOORE, No. 9 Park-place.
W. A. STOUTENBOROUGH, No. 141 John-street.
J. C. RICHARDSON, No. 107 John-street.
L. E. WILKWORTH, No. 207 Fourth-avenue.
THOS. OSBORNE, No. 9 Park-place.
JAS. BOWEN, No. 9 Broadway.

The German master painters appointed a Committee, yesterday, to concert a plan of action to regulate the relations of employers and employees. Most of the employers are opposed to the eight hours' system, and will either pay increased rates than yield to a reduction of the hours of labor.

The German piano-makers on strike met at the Germania Assembly Rooms yesterday. A delegation of house-painters was received, urging them to join in an eight-hour demonstration on the 1st of July.

The cabinet-makers, upholsterers and wood-carvers met at Teutonia Assembly Rooms, yesterday, where funds were distributed for the support of those on strike, at the rate of $3 each per week.

Yesterday morning the most of the men employed in COLGATE & CO.'s soap manufactory, in Jersey City, struck for an increase of pay. A meeting was held immediately after the strike. An address to their employers was made, in which the men asked for an advance of $2 per week, and thirty cents an hour for overtime. The demands were sent to Messrs. COLGATE & Co., who returned answer that they would not consider it until each man signed his name, so as to make himself responsible for any consequences. When this reply was received, the men immediately resolved to order all soap-makers to keep away from the works while the strike lasts, and a committee was appointed to wait upon those still at work and induce them to desist. The present rates of pay for ten hours' work are from $10 to $14 per week.

The bass plasterers of Brooklyn held a meeting on Friday, at which it was resolved that the eight-hour system was not feasible in Brooklyn.

Yesterday afternoon, JOHN PODBCZAR, employed in the cooperage attached to PALMER'S sugar refinery, corner of Joralemon and Columbia streets, Brooklyn, called at the First Precinct Police office and stated that he had been assaulted by men from BRIGGS' cooperage establishment on Furman-street.

It appears that the owners of the refinery who have heretofore had nearly all their barrels made in Briggs' shop, recently determined to make their own barrels by steam-power. As this threatened to seriously infringe on the work of the men employed at BRIGGS' shop, the latter protested against the use of machinery and threatened violence if its use was persisted in. Yesterday a number of Briggs' Union men went to the vicinity of the sugar-house, and saw RODECKER outside, and, as he says, they used a savage assault on him.

Detective CURRAN was sent with two officers to arrest the four persons complained of. RODECKER was taken along to identify his assailants. Entering Briggs' shop, they were met by CAMPBELL, the foreman, who intimated that there would be trouble if any arrests were attempted. CURRAN, however, nothing daunted, passed upstairs with RODECKER to the shop, sending his two officers up by another way to intercept fugitives. They found JOHN MALLOY, whom RODECKER identified as one who struck him, hid away among the barrels on the second floor. While bringing him out from his hiding-place, the hands in the shop gathered around with adzes and drawing-knives and assumed a menacing attitude. Officer CURRAN told them firmly that he had a warrant for the man, and if they attempted to interfere with his there would be imprisoned. The foreman CAMPBELL then informed the men that they must respect the officers and go back to work. MALLOY was then taken to the Station-house of the First Precinct.

The Strike in Albany at an End.

ALBANY, N. Y., June 22.—The strike in the West Albany Central Railroad shop is ended. Nearly all the workmen have returned to work, and the balance will resume on Monday.

Sentence of the Jersey City Police Commissioners.

Judge BEDLE yesterday passed sentence upon Commissioners EDMONDSON, GOTTZ, GROSS, HUTTON, and Chief of Police MCWILLIAMS, who were convicted at the last term of the Hudson County Court of defrauding the city. The crime of which they were convicted consisted of advancing money to some of the Commissioners every pay-day, and yet delaying or allowing the matter to run on from month to month without demanding payment from the officers. It was proved that these advances were made to enable the Captains to pay subscriptions for political purposes; and the interest was, when the Commissioners came to settle up, borne by the Captains. At the time of the passage of the act of March 4, last, regulating appointments and promotions in the Engineer Corps. The following officers, graduates of the United States Military Academy, subsequent to Major Gillespie, are appointed to the Second Lieutenancies in the Engineer Corps, and are transferred thereto, to date from the 16th inst., and will report by letter to the Chief of Engineers for orders: Second Lieuts. Samuel E. Tillman, Francis V. Green, Edward T. Holden, Fourth Artillery; John Bernard, Fifth Artillery; Philip Mauck, Second Artillery, and Carl F. Palfrey, First Artillery. Major O. H. Babcock, of the Engineer Corps, is relieved as recorder at Boston and Cape Ann. Maps, &c., in public business, and on completion of the same will resume his proper station.

Arrangements for a Fifth Avenue.

The Committee on Armories and Drill-rooms of the Board of Supervisors held a meeting yesterday, Mr. GILSEY in the chair. A resolution was adopted, requesting Commissioner VAN NORT to place the armory over Centre Market in proper repair. Mr. GILSEY states that there is now an armory at Twenty-ninth-street and Fifth-avenue, upon which the City pays an annual rent of $25,000, unoccupied; also one at the corner of Broadway and Fourth-street, leased to the City at $14,000 per annum, where no regiment is quartered at the present time. Mr. NICHOLAS B. COWDIN, Quartermaster of the Fifth Regiment, appeared before the Committee, and on behalf of his regiment, applied for a new armory.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Republican Ratification Meeting at Faneuil Hall — What Mr. Summers's Constituents Think of Him.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

BOSTON, June 22.—The first meeting of the campaign in the national and honorable Faneuil Hall and in Boston in enthusiasm of the occasion as Philadelphia or CHASE and WILSON were made to-night. A large number of the substantial men of the old-fashioned and sterling sort. The President of the evening was Hon. ALEX. H. RICE, and the Vice-Presidents the prominent Republicans of the city, with Gov. WASHBURN at their head. Mr. RICE, in opening the meeting, made a strong though brief speech, and then introduced Judge HOAR, who was the principal speaker of the evening, making a noble defense of GRANT from the attacks of CHARLES SUMNER. He said: "A Senator from Massachusetts recently, to the regret of so many of his friends, poured out on the candidate of the Republican Party such a measure of invectives as could be addressed only to a common enemy of mankind. [Hisses for SUMNER with slight applause.] No, let no sound of hissing or voice of censure in Faneuil Hall be raised against that honored name. He has stood up here as the friend of the oppressed, the advocate of emancipation. [Applause.] I honor him for what he has done, and I the more regret that, at his advanced age, he could have indulged in such a speech in such a time. It is sad for Gen. GRANT, and for the Republican Party, and saddest of all for him. The Republican Party could address the Senator in the words of the Psalmist: 'It is not an open enemy that hath done me this dishonor, &c. I could have borne it, but thou, my guide, my counselor, mine old familiar friend.' [Applause.] His unfortunate speech has fallen as dead upon Massachusetts people as if it had been but a leading editorial in a leading Democratic newspaper. A dinner was recently given to the chess player MORPHY at the Revere House, a hotel where I am told wine was sold, contrary to the statutes of the Commonwealth, and Chief-Justice SHAW and Dr. WALKER, President of Harvard, being invited, attended, and sometime after, that eloquent orator and amiable critic of mankind, WENDELL PHILLIPS, [applause and laughter,] came out with a piece of invective, in his most unmeasured and vituperative style, denouncing Dr. WALKER as a corrupter of youth, and Judge SHAW as setting at defiance the laws of the State. The astonished people of the State read it, looked a little amused, and some of them, I suppose, thought the President and the Judge had become intoxicated. But Mr. PHILLIPS has gone to his own great reward, and the Ex-President of the College will live in his honored retirement, without the least ripple upon the surface of their fair fame. And why? The people of this State know them. I tell you there is a substratum of character and public service which no daggers can ever pierce. The people know Gen. GRANT, and that is all that needs to be said of Mr. SUMNER'S speech." Judge HOAR then spoke in defense of GRANT'S Administration. Referring to his position in GRANT'S Cabinet, he said: "I desire to say that every measure of which he stood it at the Cabinet councils, I never heard any measure of administration discussed or considered except with the single reference to the public good; [applause and cheers;] and when I remember the simple, direct and modest man who sat at the head of the table there, and take up Mr. SUMNER'S speech, I can but think he is talking about some one else." [Applause.] Judge HOAR here showed that on everything Mr. SUMNER most values and cares for on the great issues before the country, on peace and public safety and the necessity for the benefit of the oppressed race, Gen. GRANT has been his most steadfast ally. Then passing to a consideration of some other objections brought against GRANT, he pointed out that though he had sometimes appointed friends and relatives to office, he had labored for civil service reform, and had been baffled at every point by Congress. It was an understanding in the Senate that no appointment should be confirmed which had not the approval of the Senators from the State for which it was made, and this has been done for corruption. The office jobbing of Congress is what President GRANT has endeavored to thwart; and if, when a Senator comes to him fighting for appointment of incompetent men, it is not to be wondered at that, if he knew a friend or a relative in their party whom he thought qualified, he gave the office to him. In conclusion, Judge HOAR referred briefly to HORACE GREELEY'S prominence before the country. He said that he had sometimes heard of a party in search of a candidate, but it is the first time that he had heard of a candidate for the Presidency in search of a party. If the Democratic Party take him as their dandy duck—if they must take a Republican editor for this business—what's the use of their existence?

Gen. STEWART L. WOODFORD, of New-York, followed Judge HOAR with an electric speech, which frequently drew out enthusiastic and ringing cheers. Gov. HAWLEY, of Kansas, spoke next, promising 30,000 majority for GRANT from the sturdy young State. Gov. GEARY, of Pennsylvania, who contradicted for the world STANTON the statements of SUMNER, and pledged his State 30,000 for GRANT, and afterward Gen. BUTLER spoke, touching upon SUMNER'S saying that when he lost his temper he lost his judgment, reason and memory; and taking the opportunity to pitch into the men opposed to GRANT, in which he ran for Governor, and to denounce civil service reform as a proposition to raise an office-holding aristocracy. Senator WILSON, who was brought into the hall during the speech of WOODFORD and heartily cheered, said a few words, and then the meeting, at near midnight, broke up with cheers for the Presidential ticket.

LOUISIANA.

Nomination of the Republican Candidate for Governor and Lieutenant-Governor.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

NEW-ORLEANS, June 22.—Hon. W. P. KELLOGG, now United States Senator, was today nominated by the Republican Convention at Baton Rouge as candidate for Governor, and Hon. C. C. ANTOINE, State Senator, (colored,) for Lieutenant-Governor. Both are good nominations and will make a strong and popular ticket. The Republicans are now certain to carry the State. WARMOUTH, PINCKBACK, GREELEY & Co. will be completely beaten.

Results of the Pinchback Convention.

NEW-ORLEANS, June 22.—The Pinchback Convention, refusing the terms of the Packardites, adjourned at Baton Rouge last night, to meet at noon today at Mechanics' Institute, in this city. They met accordingly, forty-three parishes being represented. Resolutions were adopted complimentary to PINCHBACK for his unswerving course, and devotion to his party; declaring this to be the only Convention representing the Republican Party of Louisiana; pledging the party to reform, economical government and diminished taxation. The Convention adjourned to meet Aug. 9, unless sooner called by the State Central Committee.

Active Preparations for the Coming Campaign — The Democrats Losing Ground Among the Germans.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

INDIANAPOLIS, June 22.—A large meeting was held here to-night, and a Grant Club organized, in which over two thousand members were enrolled. Speeches were made by Senator MORTON, Gen. CONNER, and others. The great interest manifested was not anticipated, for, in the beginning, the Democrats were actively engaged in getting up a Greeley Club, with fair evidences of securing some men formerly Republicans. The Volksblatt, of this city, a German Democratic paper, has declared it cannot support GREELEY. Only one German paper in the State now remains with the Democracy. The Democratic nominations for Congress, recently made, are W. E. HAILMAN, Evansville District; S. K. WOLF, New-Albany District; DAVID S. GOODING, Richmond District; Gen. MARION MANSON, Lafayette District—all straight Democrats.

MISSOURI.

Large and Enthusiastic Grant and Wilson Ratification Meeting in St. Louis.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

ST. LOUIS, June 22.—The meeting of the Republicans of St. Louis, to ratify the nomination of GRANT and COLFAX, took place to-night, and in point of magnitude and the manifestation of all earnest satisfaction at the choice of the Philadelphia Convention was not surpassed by any political gathering held in the city since the campaign of 1860. The place of meeting was at which is known as the Lucas Market, a large public square, and the addresses were delivered in the open air. At the lowest estimate, the assemblage exceeded more than double the number collected at the recent ratification of the Greeley and Brown ticket, 10,000 people having listened to the speakers to-night. Senator CARPENTER, of Wisconsin, Hon. RICHARD OGLESBY, of Ill., Senator HENDERSON, of Missouri, and other prominent Republicans, spoke, and were enthusiastically received in their presentation of the political situation. Large as the assemblage was its magnitude did not constitute its principal feature or convey an idea of the manner in which the nomination of GRANT and WILSON has been received by Missouri Republicans. There was exhibited throughout the entire proceedings of the evening an intensity of feeling and evident earnestness of purpose which argues well for the success of the party in what has been considered one of the doubtful States. The magnitude of the demonstration has surpassed even the most sanguine expectations, and the tone of the meeting was such as to fully justify the conviction that, so far as Missouri is concerned, at least, the Philadelphia nominations are cordially indorsed. Senator HENDERSON took occasion in his speech to state that he was fully convinced of the folly of the late course of taking a part in the Liberal movement, and prominent Liberals in the audience expressed their approbation. The ratification meeting has proven the Republicans of St. Louis to be united for the work of the campaign, and by its size and quality has given a prestige to the movement likely to result in much good.

Redivision of the State into Congressional Districts.

ST. LOUIS, Mo., June 22.—The Senate today passed the bill dividing the State into thirteen Congressional Districts. A large number of members of the House were present at the time and the passage of the bill created considerable sensation among them. Subsequently, when the house met and the Senate bill was announced, it was met with hisses and applause. The bill was read a first and second time, after which an excited debate ensued.

TRANQUILITY.

In the bright balmy month of June,
When all day long, with joyous tune,
Their praise the birds pricious;
When o'er the green fields far away
Carols the lark his merry lay,
When rings the throstle's song;
Fragrant of hay and meadow sweet,
The soft South wind steals forth to greet
Myriads of opening flowers;
Warm o'er the honeysuckle blows,
But stays to kiss the sunshine rose,
That queen of Summer hours.
Then would I lie at ease reclined,
With listless eye and vacant mind,
Upon some shady bank;
And if upon my charmed ear
Stole Nature's music, sweet and clear,
Ere I to slumber sank,
In that still hour my heart would be
Lapped in such deep tranquility,
So void of every care,
The prospect all around would seem
But portion of some happier dream
Than mortals ever soare.
And as the piercemine grasshopper's song,
Harmonious to each wild bier's song,
I'd deem my lot is cast
In fairy regions of the blest,
Where weariness finds perfect rest,
Where toil is ever past.
Who hath not known that quiet mood
Of calm contented solitude?
Too brief, alas, its hours!
We feel as if we'd time to stay,
And linger out the live-long day,
Chained by its magic power;
But other sleep asserts its right,
And shuts the vision from our sight,
As envious of our joy,
Or, worse, some hoarse discordant sound,
Severing the links by which we're bound,
Wakes to this world's annoy.

SWORN ON THE CRUCIFIX.

From the French of H. de Balzac.

A little beyond the boundary of the town of Vendôme, on the banks of the Loir, stands a gloomy old house with a high steep roof. It is quite solitary, not even those almost inseparable parasites of a little town—the unsavory tan-yard or the wretched auberge—are to be found near it. Between it and the river is a garden. Here the box borders, which once were closely trimmed to mark the edges of the paths, now spread where and as they will. A line of willows, the river's offspring, has shot upward, and hides the dwelling on that side as effectually as a hedge. Noxious rank weeds cover the sloping river banks with their graceful vegetation. Fruit-trees, which bear fruit no longer, and which have been uncared for the last ten years, have thrust out their boughs in every direction, and have straggled into a thick brushwood. The untrimmed espaliers project like arbors. The paths were at one time neatly graveled, but now they are choked up with purslain, so that there is scarce a sign of path left visible. A spectator looking down from the hill, the side of which is cumbered with the ruins of the ancient château of the Dukes of Vendôme—the only point of view which commands this secluded spot—would say that at some past time this was the favorite retreat of some country gentleman delighting in his roses and lilies—a lover of gardening, in fact, and before all things a lover of good fruit. He would see a Summer-house, or rather the remains of one, and in its shade a table, not yet quite eaten away by time. The roof of the house is dilapidated; its shutters are always closed; its balconies are covered with swallows' nests, and its doors are always shut. Tall weeds have taken root in the interstices of the stonework, and everything that is iron is rust-eaten. The moon and the sun, Summer and Winter and snow, have dug their way into the woodwork, warped the beams and fretted away the paint.

The melancholy silence which prevails in this spot is disturbed only by birds, cats, weasels, rats and mice, who are free to move about, fight, and devour one another, as they will. An invisible hand has written on all the place the word, mystery. If, driven by curiosity, you went to look at the side of the house which faces the road, you would see a large door, round at the top, riddled with holes by the children of the neighborhood, who had doomed it to destruction ten years ago. Through the gaps in it one can see that perfect harmony exists between the deserted interior and the decay and ruin without. The same disorder reigns here also. The paving-stones in the court-yard are pushed away by tufts of weeds. The walls are furrowed with enormous cracks. The stens are thrust out of their places; the bell-cord is rotten; the spouts are broken. "Has fire fallen from heaven and passed over the place? Or has some tribunal condemned it to be sown with salt? Did its owners insult their God or betray their country?" Such are the questions which suggest themselves; but there is no one to answer them. The empty deserted house is an enigma, of which none can tell the meaning. It was formerly a little freehold farm, and it bears the name of La Grande Bretèche. During my stay at Vendôme, whither I had gone to attend a patient, it was one of my few pleasures to contemplate this strange abode. It was better than an historical ruin. Such a ruin is the centre of a group of memories of unimpeachable authenticity; but this habitation, still erect, though its destruction was being accomplished slowly by some avenging hand, held within it a secret—a thought unknown to the world outside. More than once in the evening I essayed to scale the formidable hedge which guarded the inclosure. Defying scratches, I entered this ownerless garden, this domain in which neither the state nor the individual seemed to assert any right of possession, and I remained there whole hours observing its disorder. I would not, even with the prospect of learning the history which lay doubtless at the bottom of this weird sight, have asked a single question of the gossiping people of Vendôme, but wandering there, I composed delightful romances, and gave myself up to the luxury of melancholy. Had I known the possibly commonplace reason why the place had been deserted, I should have lost all the unpublished poems which then intoxicated my imagination. As I was rambling about my dream-kingdom one evening, the wind caused an old rusty weathercock to turn; the cry it uttered seemed to be the groan wrung from the house itself. I shuddered, and I returned to my auberge, a prey to the gloomiest thoughts. After supper my hostess entered my chamber with an air of mystery, and said:

"M. Regnault is here, Monsieur."

"Who is M. Regnault?"

"It can't be that you don't know M. Regnault," she said, as she went away.

Presently there appeared before me a tall, lank man, dressed in black and holding his hat in his hand, who, with his retreating forehead, his little conical head, and his pale face of the color of muddy water, entered the room like a ram ready to charge at his rival. The unknown wore a threadbare black coat; but he had a diamond in his shirt frill and gold rings in his ears.

"With whom have I the honor of speaking, Monsieur?" I asked.

He took a chair and seated himself in front of the fire, laid his hat upon the table and began to rub his hands, and said:

"How cold it is! I am M. Regnault, Monsieur.

I bowed.

"I am," he went on, "a notary, at Vendôme."

"Charmed to hear it, Monsieur," I exclaimed, "but I have no idea of making my will at present, for reasons well known to myself."

"One moment," he said, raising his hand to enjoin silence. "Pardon me, Monsieur, pardon me, but I am told that you sometimes go and walk about the garden at La Grande Bretèche?"

"Yes, Monsieur."

"One moment," he said, repeating the gesture with his hand. "It is a legal offense. I come, Monsieur, in the name and as the executor of the late Countess de Merret, to beg you to discontinue your visits. One moment. I am not a Turk, and I don't want to make out that it is a crime. Besides, it is only natural that you should be ignorant of the circumstances which compel me to allow the most eligible family residence in Vendôme to fall into ruin. At the same time, Monsieur, you appear to have some education, and you ought to know that the law prohibits, under heavy penalties, the intrusion of a stranger into property that is shut up by the owner. A hedge is as good as a wall. But the present state of the house may serve as an excuse for your curiosity. There is nothing I should like better than to give you the run of the place; but charged as I am with the execution of the will of Mme. de Merret, the testatrix, I have the honor, Monsieur, to beg that you will not enter the garden again. I myself, Monsieur, have never, since the opening of the will, set my foot within the house, which, I have the honor to inform you, is part of the property left by Mme. de Merret. We have only taken an inventory of the doors and windows in order to assess the taxes, which I pay yearly out of funds set apart for the purpose by the late Countess. Ah! my dear Monsieur, her will made a great sensation in Vendôme!"

"Monsieur," I asked, "should I be indiscreet in inquiring the reason of this strange state of things?"

He looked as pleased as a man set riding on his hobby always looks. He arranged the collar of his shirt, complacently drew his snuff-box from his pocket, opened it, and offered it to me; and when I refused he took a huge pinch. He was happy now. The man who has no hobby does not know all the value which can be got out of life.

"Monsieur," said M. Regnault, "I used to be Maître Roguin's head clerk at Paris. He had an excellent business, of which, I dare say, you have heard?—No? His name was, however, well enough known by reason of his unfortunate failure. I had sufficient money to live at Paris when the prices were so high in 1816, so I came here and purchased the business of my predecessor. I had some relations at Vendôme, among them a very rich aunt, who has since given me her daughter in marriage. Three months after I had been admitted to practice I was sent for one evening by the Countess de Merret to her Château of Merret. Her maid, a good girl, who is now servant at this hotel, came to my door with the Countess' carriage to fetch me. I must tell you that the Count de Merret had gone to Paris and died there two months before my arrival here. He died in a wretched state, the victim of excesses of every kind. The day of his departure Mme. de Merret had left La Grande Bretèche, and had caused it to be dismantled. Some people declare that she even burned the furniture. Have you been at Merret? No?" he said, supplying my answer. "Ah! it is a beautiful place. For the space of about three months," he continued, after a little toss of the head, "the Comte and Countess had lived together there in the strangest manner; they left off receiving visitors, and Madame lived on the ground floor while Monsieur lived on the first floor. When the Countess was alone she was never seen, except at church. Later on, at home, in her own château, she refused to see any visitors, whether male or female. A great change passed over her at the moment when she left La Grande Bretèche to go to Merret. The dear creature—I say dear, because this diamond was her present; apart from this I only saw her once—well, the good lady was very ill; she had doubtless given up all thoughts of recovery, for she refused to call in any physician. My curiosity was unusually excited, Monsieur, when I heard that Mme. de Merret was in need of my services, and I was not the only person who took an interest in the matter. The same evening, late as it was, the whole town knew that I had gone to Merret. The maid answered the questions I put to her on our way vaguely enough. She told me, however, that her mistress had received the last sacraments at the hands of the curé of Merret during the day, and it did not seem likely that she would survive the night. It was nearly 11 o'clock when I reached the château. I went up the grand staircase. After passing through some dark lofty rooms, which were cold and damp, I came to the state chamber, in which the Countess was. I had some difficulty finding her on the high bed where she was lying, though there was one of those old-fashioned Argand lamps which was intended to light her enormous bedroom. What a bedroom it was! There was a small table beside the bed, and upon it I saw a 'De Imitatione'—which, by the way, I bought afterward for my wife, together with the lamp. There was also a large arm-chair for the nurse, and two other chairs. Not a bit of fire, however. This was all the furniture. It would not have occupied ten lines in an inventory. The room was like ice, nay, more than that, it was funereal," he added, raising his hand in a theatrical manner and making a pause.

"By dint of looking, as I came near the bed, I at last saw Mme. de Merret, thanks to the reflection of the lamp on her pillow. Her face was as yellow as wax, bony and angular. She wore a lace cap which allowed her hair to be seen. It was beautiful, but white as flax. She was sitting propped up in her bed. Her brow was damp. Her fleshless hands were nothing more than bones with the skin stretched over them; the veins and sinews were perfectly visible. She must have been at one time extremely beautiful; but now I was seized with a feeling I can't describe at the sight of her. Never—if what those who placed her in her coffin say be true—did living creature become as thin as she did. It was, in short, a fearful sight. Although my professional duties had familiarized me with such spectacles, I confess that the families in tears and the scenes I have witnessed elsewhere were nothing in comparison to this woman in the solitude and silence of her vast château. I did not hear the least sound; I did not see the movement which one would have expected her breathing to cause in the clothes which covered her, and I stood quite still, looking at her in a kind of stupor. At last her great eyes moved; she tried to raise her right hand, but it fell upon the bed, and these words proceeded from her mouth like a whisper, for she could scarcely be said to have a voice: 'I have waited for you with much impatience.' The effort to speak brought a momentary flush to her cheek. 'Madame,' I began. She made a sign to me to be silent. At this moment the old nurse got up and said in my ear: 'Don't speak; Madame is in such a state that she cannot bear to hear the least noise, and what you want to say would agitate her perhaps.' I sat down. A few seconds after Mme. de Merret mustered all her remaining strength to move her right arm, and put it, not without infinite difficulty, beneath her pillow. She stopped for a moment, and then she made a last effort to draw back her hand. She brought out a sealed packet, and when she did so drops of sweat fell from her forehead. 'I give my will into your charge,' she said. 'Ah! my God! ah!' This was all. She caught up a crucifix which was upon her bed, pressed it rapidly to her lips, and died. The fixed expression of her eyes makes me shudder still, when I think of it. She must have suffered much! There was a sense of joy in her last look, and it dwelt upon her face when she was dead. I carried the will away with me, and when it was opened I saw that she had appointed me her executor. She left all her property, with the exception of some trifling legacies, to the hospital at Vendôme. But her dispositions with regard to La Grande Bretèche were as follows: She directed me to leave the house for fifty years, to be reckoned from the date of her death, in the state in which it should be found at the moment of her decease, forbidding access to the apartments to all persons whomsoever, declaring that no repairs of any kind were to be made, and even providing a fund for the payment of a watchman, if this should be necessary, in order to insure the complete execution of her intentions. If, at the end of this term, the wishes of the testatrix had been strictly fulfilled the house was to go to my heirs, for Monsieur knows that notaries are not permitted to receive legacies; otherwise La Grande Bretèche was to revert to the right heirs of the testatrix, as the law should direct, subject however to a proviso, that the conditions contained in a codicil annexed to the will, and which was not to be opened before the expiration of the said term, were to be by them fulfilled. The will was not disputed, and in"

The tall angular notary did not finish the sentence, but at the last words he looked at me with a air of triumph. I made him at once completely happy by complimenting him on his story.

"Monsieur," I said, "you have interested me deeply; I can fancy that I see her now before me, dying, paler than her winding-sheet; her brilliant eyes fill me with fear; I shall dream of her to-night. But you must have formed some conjecture regarding the dispositions of this eccentric will?"

"Monsieur," he said, with comical reserve, "I never allow myself to pass a judgment on a people who have done me the honor of presenting me with a diamond."

After a little more discussion of the matter which led to nothing more interesting than a detailed account of all the conjectures of all the good people of the town concerning the mysterious codicil, M. Regnault took his leave, in high good humor. Then I sat down, placed my feet on the two dogs in the fire, place, and was planning out a romance of the Radcliffe type, based upon the information I had received from the lips of M. Regnault, when my door was opened and my hostess—a fat, radiant, good-tempered person, entered the room.

"Well, Monsieur," she said, "I suppose M. Regnault has been giving you his eternal story about La Grande Bretèche."

"He has, Mère Lepas."

"What did he tell you?"

I repeated in a few words the grim freezing history of Mme. de Merret. At each sentence, my hostess stretched her neck forward, regarding me with the subrigiste's habitual perspicacity—a quality which combines something of the instinct of the gendarme with the astuteness of the spy and the cunning of the tradesman.

"My dear Dame Lepas," I added in conclusion, "you seem to know something more about the matter, eh? If not, why have you come up into my room?"

"Ah! on my faith as an honest woman, as truly as my name is Lepas—"

"No oaths, please; your eyes are big with some secret. You knew M. de Merret. What kind of a man was he?"

"M. de Merret was a fine man, and a good sort of a gentleman. He came from Passardy, and he was as hot as a pepper-box, as weasy. He paid ready money for everything, he made no difficulties with any one. He was rather wild, and the ladies found him very agreeable."

"What! because he was rather wild?" I asked my hostess.

"Very likely," she said. "You may suppose that he had something to recommend him when he could marry Mme. de Merret, who—without wishing to say anything against the other women—was the most beautiful and the wealthiest match in the country. She had near about twenty-two thousand livres a year. The whole town was at the wedding. The bride was a little engaging creature, quite a jewel of a woman. Ah! they made a lovely couple."

"Were they happy in their married life?"

"H'm! H'm! Yes and no—so far, at least, as one can judge; for you don't suppose that we townsfolk lived hand and glove with them. Mme. de Merret was a good little woman, very quiet, and she had a good deal to bear sometimes; but, though he was a little proud, we liked him. Bah! it was natural for him to be like that. When one's a gentleman, you see."——

"But there must have been some catastrophe, to make them separate in the violent way they did."

"I never said there was any catastrophe. I don't know anything at all about it."

"I am quite sure now you know everything."

"Well, Monsieur, I'll tell you all about it. When I saw M. Regnault go up to your room I thought he was going to speak to you about Mme. de Merret and La Grand Bretèche. That gave me the idea of asking Monsieur's advice, for you seem to be prudent and incapable of betraying a poor woman like me, who has never done harm to any one, and who is nevertheless tormented by her conscience. Till now, I have never dared to open my lips to any of the people about, for they are never tired of wagging their tongues, and, Monsieur, I have never had a traveler who stayed so long as you in my auberge and to whom I could tell the story of the fifteen thousand francs."

"My dear Dame Lepas," I said, stopping the flow of her words, "if your secret is of a nature to compromise me I would not for worlds take it upon my shoulders."

"Don't be afraid," she said interrupting me. "You shall see."

Her eagerness led me to believe that I was not the only person to whom my good landlady had imparted the secret of which I was to be the sole depositary, and I listened.

"Monsieur," she said, "the Emperor sent some Spanish or other prisoners of war to this place, and I had to take in, at the expense of the Government, a young Spaniard, who came here on parole. Notwithstanding his parole he went every day to report himself to the sous-préfet. He was a grandee of Spain—excuse me a moment—his name ended in os and dig; it was something like Bagos de Férédia. I have it down in my register, and you can see it if you like. Ah! he was a handsome young man for a Spaniard; they say they are all plain-looking. He was only five feet two or three inches in height, but he was well made; he had small hands, and he took great care of them—ah! you should have seen. He had as many brushes for his hands as a woman has for her whole toilet! He had long black hair and his eyes were as bright as fire; his skin was slightly copper-colored, but I admired him all the same. The linen he wore was the finest I have ever seen on any one, though I have entertained Princes. He didn't eat much, but his manners were so polished and courteous that one couldn't complain. Indeed, I was very fond of him, though he didn't say four words a day, and it was impossible to keep up the least conversation with him; if you spoke to him he didn't answer. It is a peculiarity they all have, they say. He read his breviary like a priest, and went to mass and all the offices regularly. And where do you think he met? we remembered that afterward—scarcely two rods from Mme. de Merret's chair. He took up his position there the first time he went to the church, and no one imagined there was any design in what he did. Besides, he never raised his eyes from his book, poor young man! Then, Monsieur, he took to wandering about in the evening on the hill among the ruins of the château. It was his only amusement, poor man! And then he thought about his country, where they say there is nothing but hills. After the first few days of his detention here he began to be later out of nights. I was uneasy when I saw that he did not come home till midnight; but we got accustomed to his whim; he took the door-key with him, and we paid no more attention to him. He was lodging with us in the house we had then in the Rue des Casernes. Then one of the grooms told us that one evening, when he went to wash the horses in the river, he thought he saw our Spanish grandee swimming at a distance just like a fish. When he returned I told him to take care of the weeds, and he didn't seem to like the idea of having been seen in the water. Finally, Monsieur, one day, or rather, one morning, we did not find him in his chamber; he had not come back at all. I searched everywhere, and found something written on a piece of paper in his table-drawer, in which there were also fifty golden Spanish coins, called portugues, worth about 5,000 francs; there were besides some diamonds, of the value of 10,000 francs, in a little sealed box. The writing was to the effect that, in case he should not return he left his money and diamonds for masses to thank God for his escape and to pray for his safety. At that time my husband was still alive, and he went off to search for him—and this is the queerest part of the story. My husband brought back the Spaniard's clothes, which he had found under a big stone on the bank of the river, near the château and almost opposite La Grande Bretèche. He had gone there so early in the morning that no one had seen him, and so, when he had read the letter, he burnt the clothes, and we declared, as Count Férédia wished, that he had escaped. The sous-préfet put all the gendarmes on the alert, but they never caught him. Lepas thought that the Spaniard was drowned. But I, Monsieur, am of a different opinion; I am inclined to believe that he had something to do with Mme. de Merret. Rosalie has told me that the crucifix her mistress was so fond of, and which she had buried with her, was made of ebony and silver; now when he first began to live with us M. Férédia had a crucifix of ebony and silver, and I have never seen it since. So, Monsieur, you don't think I need feel any remorse about the Spaniard's fifteen thousand francs—and have I not a perfect right to them?"

"Undoubtedly. But have you never asked any questions of Rosalie?"

"Indeed I have, Monsieur; but it's no good; she won't answer any more than a stone wall. She knows something, but I can't get it out of her."

My hostess talked with me a minute or two longer, and then left me, a prey to vague and sombre thoughts. Rosalie became in my eyes the most interesting being in Vendôme. As I watched her I discovered the traces of something locked within her breast, spite of the florid health which beamed in her plump face. She had some hidden cause for remorse or for hope; her very attitude always betrayed the fact that she had a secret. Her bearing was, however, artless and homely, and her silly thoughtless laugh was far from suggesting any idea of criminality. You would have passed a verdict of not guilty the moment you saw the large red and blue checked handkerchief which covered her full bosom, and the tightly-fitting dress with white and violet stripes which set off her figure so well.

"No," I thought, "I will not leave Vendôme till I know the whole history of this mysterious Spaniard

STOKES.

Yesterday's Proceedings in the Fisk Murder Case.

Nine Jurors Obtained up to Last Evening—A Tiff Between Counsel—The Second Panel Exhausted.

The trial of EDWARD S. STOKES for the murder of JAMES FISK, Jr., was resumed yesterday before Judge INGRAHAM, in the Court of Oyer and Terminer. Two additional jurors were impanelled, making, together with those already sworn in, nine jurors. The prisoner was represented, as usual, by his counsel, Messrs. MCKEON, DAILY and TOWNSEND, and the prosecution was conducted by District-Attorney GARVIN, assisted by the private counsel, Messrs. BEACH and FULLERTON.

JOHN WILLIAM VANDERVEER was the first juror called. He had formed no opinion as to the guilt or innocence of Mr. STOKES, but he resides in Jersey, and was therefore disqualified. JAS. ARMSTRONG read the newspaper accounts of the shooting of Mr. FISK, but had formed no opinion upon it. He was never before in a Court-room and had no acquaintance with any one connected with the case, with the managers of the Erie Railroad or with any City politicians. He had no conscientious scruples against having to sit in a verdict of guilty, in a capital case, provided the evidence justified it, and his judgment would alone be influenced by the testimony adduced. The triers found the challenge as to favor to be true, and the witness was challenged peremptorily by the defense. CHARLES SIEBERT, a dry-goods dealer, had formed and expressed an opinion in regard to the merits of this case. It placed upon this jury he would endeavor to lay aside the private prejudices and be guided by the evidence. He would be, however, to some extent influenced by his opinions, which it would require considerable evidence to remove, and he was excused. OLIVER A. SMITH had formed an opinion which would prejudice his judgment, and he was rejected on the challenge of the prisoner's counsel. WILLIAM E. KING had formed an opinion on the merits of the case, based on newspaper reports. He still retained that opinion, and would continue to do so notwithstanding what evidence might be produced. He was rejected. CHARLES SCHNEIDER had an opinion in favor of the killing of Mr. FISK which he would undoubtedly carry into the jury-box with him. He was rejected.

CHARLES LONGSTREET, a retired merchant, was challenged for principal cause. He had formed an opinion on the question of guilt or innocence which would influence his verdict. His conclusions on the evidence adduced, he was not opposed to capital punishment; in fact, during his seat as a juror, however, he would not commit himself unprejudiced until testimony was given to remove an impression. He was challenged to the favor. JOHN KITTY had formed an opinion on the question of guilt or innocence which would affect his verdict. He was promptly rejected. JAMES M. HAZELTINE had formed a fixed opinion on the question of the guilt or innocence of Mr. STOKES, based upon the newspaper reports, which no evidence could remove. He was permitted to retire.

WM. SHELLEY, iron merchant, had formed an opinion in this case which it would take pointed evidence to remove. It placed upon the jury he would be guided by the evidence and render a verdict accordingly. He had no acquaintance with any of the parties to this unfortunate affair. He had no personal bias or prejudice against Mr. STOKES, but his opinion on the subject was very deep-seated. He was rejected. NORMAN BOEHMAN, a retired merchant, had no acquaintance with GOULD, FISK or TWEED; was non-connected with the City politics. Had several conversations with a friend of the prisoner on the case of Mr. FISK, and had formed an opinion based upon that conversation. This opinion would very likely affect his verdict, and he was directed to stand aside. GEORGE STUART considered he would be a prejudiced juror, so strong was his opinion as to the merits of the case.

JOHN JAMES—It appears to me, by the manner in which the examination of witnesses is conducted, that nine-tenths of those who have read the newspapers are of necessity excluded from being on the jury. The law means that if a man has read a paper and has formed an opinion, and afterwards he could go on the jury and lay aside that opinion and decide according to the evidence elicited, he is a good juror. That is my construction of the law, and all I am to be satisfied of is that the opinion he has heretofore entertained would not affect his judgment.

Mr. TOWNSEND requested that the Court state to the triers that they should be confined by what the law prescribes in relation to "present opinion."

Judge INGRAHAM refused to do so, as he was simply to find out the condition of the witness' mind, and whether he was prejudiced for or against the prisoner.

In reply to Mr. TOWNSEND, the witness said his present opinion was prejudicial to the prisoner, and it might influence his verdict as a juror.

To Mr. GARVIN—My verdict on the jury would be guided altogether by the evidence given on the trial. The triers considered the challenge true, and the witness was rejected.

ALBERT EUGENE REED had formed an opinion on this case in the newspaper reports. Had no acquaintance with FISK, GOULD or TWEED, but knew the Middle family well enough to take shooting. His opinion was very strongly fixed, and would probably prejudice his decision on the evidence. HERMAN KICKELINO was excused for not having a knowledge of the language, and GEORGE ARBOT for having a very decided opinion on the question of guilt or innocence.

ALEXANDER HENDERSON, straw-goods dealer, had formed a sort of opinion on the case, but it would not influence his verdict if put upon the jury. The challenge as to favor was denied, and the counsel for the defense said he was willing to waive his rights. The prosecution peremptorily challenged him.

A TIFF BETWEEN COUNSEL.

Judge INGRAHAM—I think, gentleman, you will have to go to the country for jurors.

Mr. MCKEON—The selection of jurors by the District-Attorney after the triers had declared them eligible. When he was District-Attorney such right was not given the prosecution, and he thought the law ought to be repealed in that respect.

Judge INGRAHAM—I agree with you in stating that the law ought to be repealed in many respects, but it should apply to both sides.

Mr. MCKEON—The District-Attorney has the same right that we have, but he can exercise more discretion. And here let me say, that if this telegraphing between the private counsel and the District-Attorney is permitted to continue, the public will not stand it.

Mr. BEACH—This telegraphing which you refer to shall continue.

Mr. MCKEON—The whole thing is most discreditable to the public administration.

Mr. BEACH—If we are to be assailed in the manner in which we have been, we shall not stand it.

Mr. MCKEON—I object to the counsel addressing the Court. He must speak through the District-Attorney.

Mr. BEACH—I appeal to your Honor, that when the counsel makes these systematic attacks upon my appearance here regularly, I hope I will be permitted to answer them in the proper spirit.

Judge INGRAHAM—At the proper time, yes, sir.

Soloman Butler, Martin Lichtman, Charles Kronael, Edward Payson Dustee, Ingham Lodge, James McElman and Thomas Conway were excused, some for having an opinion, and others for having objections to capital punishment.

THOS. WHITEHEAD, a broker, had an impression which would affect his verdict, and was excused.

JOSEPH D. FRAZER, No. 315 West Thirty-fifth street, had an opinion which would influence his verdict, and was excused.

LOUIS ARCHER, a cloth dealer, had an opinion which would require testimony to remove, and was excused.

HERMAN WEDEMEYER, Twentieth Ward, and a grocer, had an opinion which it would require testimony to remove, and was excused.

THE EIGHTH JUROR.

PETER E. HOPKINS, Sixteenth Ward, a butler, had an opinion, but he would not interfere with his giving an impartial verdict according to the testimony. Was a stranger to all parties and had no objection to entering the jury-box. Came to do impartial justice between the people and the prisoner. Mr. HOPKINS was accepted and sworn in as the eighth juror.

JOHN J. BAILEY, Twentieth Ward, had an opinion which would require a great deal of testimony to remove, and was excused.

JAS. WALKER, Nineteenth Ward, and a plumber, had an impression or opinion, and was also excused.

THE NINTH JUROR.

JOHN R. THOMPSON, Sixteenth Ward, a tailor doing business at No. 820 Broadway, had an impression, but believes he could render an impartial verdict on the testimony; he would, however, require direct evidence to change his opinion with respect to the killing; had formed his opinion from the newspapers; would believe conviction or acquittal on what he read in the papers; would be guided as testified to concerning with the testimony, irrespective of present impressions. Mr. THOMPSON was sworn in as the ninth juror.

SAMUEL WORMS, a dealer in oils, No. 312 East Forty-first street, had an opinion which would still remain notwithstanding the testimony, and was excused.

JOHN PATTERSON, of the Eighteenth Ward, a painter, was in the proper legal state of mind as to preconceived opinion, but was opposed to capital punishment, and therefore excused. Frank's R. Wheeler, Samuel Shattuck, Lyndin D. Sherman, Charles H. Stein, Richard H. Morris and Richard Probst were excused for having formed an opinion which it would take evidence to remove. GEORGE HALLANTINE had an acquaintance with the prisoner, and was excused by consent. HENRY D. FRANCIS had an opinion, and was rejected.

Out of the 125 jurymen called only sixty-eight answered, and the remainder were fined $100 each. The jurors impaneled were accompanied from the Court by an officer, and strictly enjoined from speaking to any one on the subject of the trial. The Court then adjourned to Monday morning at 10½ o'clock.

CITY GAS SUPPLY.

The Aldermanic Inquiry—Can the City Supply its Own Gas?—The Committee in Session.

At a meeting of the Board of Aldermen, held on the 3d inst., a petition was presented from the Anti-Monopoly Association asking that a thorough investigation be made in relation to the location of the City, and that the expense at which citizens can be provided with gas by the City be ascertained. The petition was referred to the Committee on Finance, composed of Messrs. HASKINS, (Chairman,) VANCE and WILSON.

The Committee met yesterday in the Aldermanic Committee-room. Messrs. THOMPSON, Secretary, and HASKINS, Chairman, were present, and a few of the Presidents of the City Gas Companies, who had been invited to attend the meeting.

Mr. TOMLINSON occupied the attention of the Committee for a short while, dilating upon the necessity of investigating the gas question, stating that by the City undertaking itself the work of supply, $1,000,000 would probably be saved. He had been appointed Controller, and was determined to attend. The Controller did not appear.

Mr. VAN HORT was also called, but there was no response. The President of the Manhattan Gas-Light Company (Gen. CHARLES ROOME) was called by Mr. TOMLINSON.

The gentleman asked the Chairman if it is the intention of the City to engage in the manufacture of gas?

Alderman MEHRBACH—Well, if it can be seen to be profitable, we will probably recommend it.

Gen. ROOME—Well, whether it is your intention or not, I would like to know why you sent for me?

Alderman MEHRBACH—We want to know something as to the cost of the gas supply.

Mr. TOMLINSON then asked Gen. ROOME how long he had been President of the Manhattan Gas Company.

A.—Seventeen years.

Q.—What is the capital? A.—Four millions.

Q.—How many cubic feet of gas do you manufacture annually?

Alderman VANCE—I think before Mr. TOMLINSON begins to put these questions he ought to ask the permission of the Committee. I say this because I see no reason for Mr. TOMLINSON to go in the line of the examination. This matter was referred to this Committee for the purpose of ascertaining the cost of lighting the streets. We must confine ourselves to that at the same time that we endeavor to find out whether any saving can be effected by the City supplying its own gas.

Mr. TOMLINSON, as the Chairman's suggestion, put his question in writing, and handed it to the Committee for persusal to put it.

Gen. ROOME—Before I go any farther I see no use in this sending in of written questions. At some time, respectfully, declines to give this Committee or any other persons any information, as I consider my private business, and I see their authority to know. I ask you will allow me to appear by counsel.

Alderman VANCE interposed, saying that the Committee was of opinion, ought they have the communication with the Controller in relation to this matter.

Gen. ROOME—Now the next question the gentleman might ask, how much it costs to manufacture the gas, and then how much we charge the City. I came here upon invitation, and not as a criminal compelled to appear. I am not compelled to answer such questions, and I decline to do so. I think it is better to place me in such a position as this without books or papers, and to ask me to expose my business. I am perfectly willing to do what I can to aid you in your investigation, but I would rather do so by counsel.

Mr. TOMLINSON—I wish to say I never intended to put such questions to the gentleman.

Gen. ROOME—Please remember that I represent the interests of other people.

Mr. ROOME then retired.

It was then agreed to summon the Controller and the Commissioner of Public Works to attend the next meeting if possible.

Mr. TOMLINSON then called the Secretary of the Manhattan Gas Company, who was notified to attend, but there was no response.

The President of the New-York Gas Company was then called, and suggested that all questions should be submitted in writing, and then the Presidents of the gas companies could answer any they thought fit, and decline any they considered trenching upon their private affairs. He for himself would take the same course as Gen. ROOME, and decline to answer.

Mr. TOMLINSON objected to the President's suggestion.

It was agreed that the gentlemen summoned can appear by counsel, and an adjournment then took place.

Two Rival Societies—An Injunction Issued Against the St. Patrick Mutual Alliance Association.

In Supreme Court, Chambers, yesterday, before Judge BRADY, application was made by W. T. Burdsell for an injunction and the appointment of a receiver, in the case of the St. Patrick Mutual Alliance Benevolent Association against the St. Patrick Mutual Alliance Association, Jas. J. Traynor, Jeremiah Crowley, and Wm. O'Connell. It appears by the complaint that the Association which appears as plaintiff, succeeded to what has been known as the St. Patrick Benevolent Mutual Alliance and Benevolent Association, of which TRAYNOR and his co-defendants were officers, the original Society being merged in the plaintiff, the latter duly incorporated and having a certificate of incorporation issued. Since then, TRAYNOR and his co-defendants have assumed the right to organize the Society which appears as defendants and claim the right to control the funds. The complainant further claims that a large majority of the thirty odd thousand members adhere to the plaintiff's Society, which is the only one entitled to the benefits in favor of the movement of defendants, and that the legal steps have not been taken by the latter for their incorporation. The object of both Societies, as disclosed by the constitution, is, among other things, to aid the widow and orphan, afford its members mutual support and assistance, and emigrate such of them as desire those advantages.

Judge BRADY granted a temporary injunction restraining the defendants, or either of them, from drawing the money of the Society from the banks in which it is on deposit, accompanied with a notice to show cause why the injunction should not be made perpetual, and a receiver of the funds appointed.

The Market and the Bowling-Green Savings Bank.

Savings Banks.

The depositors of the Market Savings Bank of Nassau-street have been receiving during the past two days a payment of 20 per cent. on their claims. From 10 A. M. until 2 P. M. Mr. F. C. WORDEN, the receiver, has been giving drafts upon the National Park Bank to long lines of men, women and children, who seemed much satisfied at the recovery of even one-third of that which they had been accustomed to regard as a dead loss. On Friday Mr. WORDEN paid the gross sum of $63,000 to 776 depositors, and on Saturday $48,500 to 538, making for the two days a total of $110,500 to 1,314 depositors. Out of this sum, only about two were noticed on both days at the Park Bank.

The depositors in the Bowling-Green Savings Bank are still nourishing that deferred hope which makes the heart sick. The receiver, Mr. EDWARDS PIERREPONT, son of the bank president of that name, is constantly urged to be seen in the offices of his counsel, Mr. J. E. DEVLIN, in Broadway. Whenever approached by an unhappy depositor he is sure to promise a dividend of 25 per cent very shortly.

A Little Boy Shot by his Playmate.

From the Fairmont County (Wis.) Censor, June 15.

Last Thursday, about noon, two boys named respectively HORACE MCAULEY, about six years old, and FRANK GOSS, about the same age, were together in the brush just at the southwest corner of the village. Young MCAULEY had a loaded revolver, which it was ascertained afterward, he had slyly taken from a drawer in Col. BUTTS's office. The boys were alone, and while so, FRANK GOSS was shot in the abdomen; so the ball entered the boy's body. He was taken carefully home by his uncle, and sent word to the town for some surgeon, when everything possible was done for him, but without avail. Young MCAULEY, in the meantime, had come back into town, and passing Mr. RUSSELL, told her that he had shot a rabbit down in the brush. Then he went to his office to replace the revolver in the drawer, when he heard, and very quickly took the boy to task for taking the pistol, but he did not know of the great mischief done, and HORACE did not tell, even when so frightened. In fact, he told nobody; but went home, where he failed to eat his dinner, whether from the thought of shooting the child, boy or from his sense of Col. BUTTS's hand, is not a certainty. We disbelieve the story that the shooting was premeditated. It is not at all likely that it was, indeed. FRANK GOSS would so have told his mother that HORACE did not mean to shoot him; that he had shot once at a bird, and neither of them thought the pistol would shoot again, not knowing anything about a revolver. This is probably the honest fact as we can ever get. FRANK GOSS was buried on Saturday, the schools turning out in procession at the funeral.

SUMMARY OF AMUSEMENTS.

Musical.

THE MUSICAL MASS-MEETING AT BOSTON.

MR. GILMORE'S cherished monstrosity has had quite as much attention as it deserves. While there are features about it of undoubtable interest and importance, the general effect is that of a huge, showy sham. The unskilful may laugh or go into fits of enthusiasm over the Peace Jubilee—whenever the infatuated and excited may laugh in their sleeves—but the judicious, the true lovers of art, must surely grieve. We say there are features about the affair of undoubtable note; but a good proof of the monstrous disadvantages accompanied in the fact that the very best things at the Jubilee are the ones that have gone for least. "The emptiest things reverberate most sound," and sound, under all the circumstances, is the prime consideration at Boston. For how much, for example, does the exquisite piano-forte playing of ARABELLA GODDARD go in so vast a space and addressed to ears almost split with the bellowings of the 20,000 fiends of instrumentals, military bands and the reverberant hollowings of carnival! So far as it was desirable to hear the Peace Jubilee it was "long enough," the report, we notice, has long since satisfied, while the report of the Jubilee itself will be very short. We do not deny that there has been use in it; but is it the use that consists in the demonstration of unanimity. Apart from this there is inevitably such a lot of unmusical stuff to wade through, and so much to be said in condemnation of, and among these, so far as there has been any, melodeon some profit and encouragement to the good city of Boston, we have nothing to tender in the premises but regretful congratulations.

Dramatic.

THE CITY THEATRES.

"On the Jury," at Wallack's, has been the main theatrical event of late; and the fluctuations of Mr. WALTER PHILLIPS' drama has decided with the fierce heat to see whether the theatre shall be full or empty. The result has been that the houses, with the exception of that of Thursday night, have been surprisingly good. The acting at Messrs. BANGHAM, FRANKAU and GROSSMITH, and of Mrs. SEFTON and the Misses GERMON and BURNS, have a large share of the credit for this; and the great "sensation" collision scene—in which, by the way, the steamboat is more like a North River than a Thames craft, the latter being always cut very low in the water, to clear the bridges—is, to many, very attractive. "On the Jury" continues on the bills. "Enoch Arden," with Mr. ATKINS, will be repeated for one week more at Booth's. Mr. AIKEN disports himself nightly as Red Mazeppa, at Wood's Museum. Mr. JOHNNY ALLEN continues his delicate personation of Schneider, at the Olympic, and this drama is found very much to the taste of his patrons. The benefit of Mr. THEODORE THOMAS, at the Central Park Garden, on Thursday night, was in all respects a success, and creditable to the beneficiary and the public.

Theatrical Matters.

Mr. G. L. FOX and his pantomime troupe attracted immense audiences to the Boston Globe last week. The Fabbri-Maidet Opera Troupe was last week in St. Paul. Miss MAY MILDENHALL was at the Continental Theatre in San Francisco. The successful debut at the Troy Opera-house of Miss JULIA COVENTRY is mentioned by the local papers. The Wyndham Comedy Troupe was last week in Chicago. The Portsmouth Chronicle says the many friends of Mr. CHAS. E. BIDWELL, the well-known dramatic manager, will regret to learn that he is seriously ill from consumption, and will probably never appear on the stage again. The Vokes were last week at the Boston Globe. Latest advices report that Miss ANNA MEHLIG had a most complimentary reception in Portland, Oregon. The Baltimore Sun, of June 19, says: "We are happy to learn from Prof. GEORGE RHULING, of the Maryland Eye and Ear Institute, of Baltimore, that he was called upon to operate upon Mr. JEFFERSON, at his country-seat, Hohokus, N. J., for threatened loss of sight, the result of the operation have equaled the most sanguine anticipations of himself and friends. The disease from which he suffered was cataracts—the most destructive and painful of all diseases attacking the human eye. Dr. RHULING has returned to Baltimore, and says that up to the present the operation gives every promise of complete recovery." Mr. JEFFERSON is thus probably assured that, with the opening of the next season, he will appear before them, aroused from his sleep, and with the same genial power which has made him such a great and exceptional popular favorite."

Notes of Matters Ahead.

Mme. PATTI has made the great lyric hit of the day in the new opera "Gelimer." Both her acting and singing are enthusiastically praised. Happily, if the opera is sometimes common-place, the composer has given his best thought to his heroine. "What there is of vitality and movement in his imaginings," writes an authority, "is concentrated on Gelimer;" another writer declares that Mme. PATTI has taken higher ground, both dramatically and musically, in this opera than she ever before occupied.... Mr. MAX MARETZEK writes from London that the engagement of Mlle. LUCCA for the New-York Academy next season is positively concluded.... TAGLIONI, the once famous dancer, has composed a new ballet, which, under the title of "Militaria," has just been produced at the Berlin Opera-house. The plot depicts the adventures of German soldiers in France, and the composition has been extremely successful..... Mr. BOUCICAULT has been at it again. His new pantomime is christened "Daddy O'Dowd," and is said to be full of sensations and buncombe hibernicisms. It is to be produced early in October. Mme. CHAUMONT is mentioned as a most remarkable contralto singer. Her singing is accompanied by movements which combine with it happily and unusually picturesque personation, with appreciable considerable histrionic ability. The audience is urged "just as soon have a duet" as a case of bigamy, to relieve the revolting nature of the double discovery. Then Solva, who has gone mad, (the letter being the tenor instead of the prima donna,) states Gelimer, taking her for Ortaire and the scene ends in a trio. We are considering Mme. ADELINA PATTI does not resemble strikingly Signor COTOGNI. The setting of the story is as heavy as the situations themselves. There is no overture, the composer preferring to indulge in a long symphony after the curtain has risen, causing apparently what is intended to be a thrilling effect, but which soon grows wearisome. Then were several encores, but it was the marvelous choreographic feats of Mlle. BRIANZA, LEGA, Miss HOLLAND and Signorina NINI, the brunette, which excited the Alhambra auditory to enthusiastic manifestations. It is probable that Mlle. LINDA, who danced with the Viennese troupe who were at the Drury-lane Italian Opera season last year, will be the main attraction. Roi Carotte was decently and well done, but it never can be more than the opera of a fortnight. Mme. CHAUMONT unites two qualities rarely found together—her mimetic and histrionic powers are almost equal. She plays, according to some critics, "Fleurette" in the manner of Mme. ALBONI, Madame ALBANI, Monsieur, which remains the best thing of the season. Mme. CHAUMONT plays she gives a sufficiently feasible impersonation of the jealous and angry wife. What, however, is most effective, is the manner in which she imparts dramatic force to a dialogue between her husband and her rival, or shows by a well-chosen gesture or two the concentrated fire of those with whom she is thrown into contact. Her manner of taking her audience into her confidence is not unlike that of M. HAVEL in "Le Médecin de Théodore." Miss CHAUMONT plays a girl with Mexican blood in her veins, who, conceiving that her lover has been slain, marries the man she supposes has murdered him, and commences immediately after marriage a course of tragi-comic vengeance. In "Le Wagon des Dames," she, assists a young gin who, returning from school in the carriage not apart for ladies, collects, while singing sleep, a large amount of scandal, which she proceeds to retail to him on her father's drawing-room. As her revelations concern the rascal therein assembled, the effect, however amusing, is not wholly pleasant. The former of these characters suits Mme. CHAUMONT well; the latter not at all. Her vexation upon her husband is wonderfully comic, and the recollection of the "Comédie des Dames" scenes is wholly extravagant. Making all possible allowance for the march of intellect, it is impossible to conceive a French maid-of-all-work with so much knowledge of the world and "cheek." There were other points in the performance which we strongly suspect. The name of the talented Mme. CHAUMONT is Hostier, but whether she bounds that as a stage appellation we cannot say.

"Gelimer."

In addition to the information received by Mme. CHAUMONT, some weeks ago, in relation to the attention just now in London. One is the "Queen of Trumps," by POWER HARWOOD; the other the "King Carrot," by MAY CROMMELIN and SARDOU. Of the first a trustworthy musical authority speaks as follows:

"The accomplished Prince has the reputation of having a wonderful memory; and it is precisely because his memory is so much more powerful and influential than his musical gift or constructive capacities have developed that his music is so continuative in type, and so overcrowded with the themes of other composers. 'Gelimer' is a striking instance of this lack of creative power; and there is scarcely a bar which is not suggestive. It was serious to overhear in the stalls and in the foyer, where truthful criticism is sure to be heard, the remarks that were passed between VERDI, another passage to MENDELSSOHN, a little bit to AUBER, a large portion to DONIZETTI, and so small also of the orchestration to MEYERBEER. To dissect the score, and to ascertain to what pupils in composition Mr. HARWOOD has been apprenticed, would be a proprietary task, which we heard specified particularly. 'Gelimer,' of course, must be regarded from the purely Italian point of view, and if Herr WAGNER wanted to illustrate the defects and absurdities of this school, he would revel in the scenes supplied deliberately in the Prince's production. The characters are all over-drawn, and in one point as regards their vocal attributes. Villainy and scoundrelism, and there is no deficiency of these, sing as tunefully as virtue and innocence. When the heavy father, Frank Giovanni, tells his son, Il Conte Adriano, a libertine and a tyrant, how much he hates the latter time in time raging torrent the girl he had seduced, because she used for help for her child, (she is Gelmina,) Signor COTOGNI has as pleasant strains to sing as Gelmina herself. When she is coquettishly imitating the voice of Adriano. It is this similarity of style in each portion of the duet that renders the opera so dull and oppressive. Signor RIZZELLI's libretto, doubtless, is not inspiring; it is of the transpontine class. A villainous Lord of the Manor strives to seduce a virtuous peasant girl. Gelmina, who is consistent in her principles, spurns the seducer, and meditates on the beneficiary and the public.

His new pantomime is christened "Daddy O'Dowd," and is said to be full of sensations and buncombe hibernicisms. It is to be produced early in October. Mme. CHAUMONT is mentioned as a most remarkable contralto singer. Her singing is accompanied by movements which combine with it happily and unusually picturesque personation, with appreciable considerable histrionic ability. The audience is urged "just as soon have a duet" as a case of bigamy, to relieve the revolting nature of the double discovery. Then Solva, who has gone mad, (the letter being the tenor instead of the prima donna,) states Gelmina, taking her for Ortaire and the scene ends in a trio. We are considering Mme. ADELINA PATTI does not resemble strikingly Signor COTOGNI. The setting of the story is as heavy as the situations themselves. There is no overture, the composer preferring to indulge in a long symphony after the curtain has risen, causing apparently what is intended to be a thrilling effect, but which soon grows wearisome. Then were several encores, but it was the marvelous choreographic feats of Mlle. BRIANZA, LEGA, Miss HOLLAND and Signorina NINI, the brunette, which excited the Alhambra auditory to enthusiastic manifestations. It is probable that Mlle. LINDA, who danced with the Viennese troupe who were at the Drury-lane Italian Opera season last year, will be the main attraction. Roi Carotte was decently and well done, but it never can be more than the opera of a fortnight. Mme. CHAUMONT unites two qualities rarely found together—her mimetic and histrionic powers are almost equal. She plays, according MILITARY GOSSIP.

The Seventh Regiment N. G. leaves for Saratoga on the 3d day of July for a week in the tented field. Col. FRANCIS CLARK has issued elaborate orders for the military guidance and government of the regiment in camp, and Quartermaster WEED has completed the arrangements for transportation, subsistence, &c., &c. No effort or expense has been spared to make "Camp Sherman" the most complete and satisfactory of all the famous encampments of this regiment. Military excursions generally are not in favor among our City regiments this season, but the encampment of the Seventh, which promises health and pleasure combined with military improvement, has met with unexpected favor among the young men of the at regiment, and it will doubtless parade with full ranks on its departure for Saratoga. Those who are prevented by business engagements from participating in this affair, will regret their absence, and will envy their more fortunate comrades. The camp ground is located at Glen Mittahill, about one mile and a half north of Saratoga village, and is pronounced by competent judges as a most admirable location for the purpose. The soil is dry, the air pure, and the surroundings are the finest the country affords. The view towards the Green Mountains of Vermont on the east, and north on the mountains about Lake George, beside the regular guard duty, the programme provides for the usual drills of the regiment, and the parade will no doubt be conducted in a manner that all will have plenty of leisure and food as, and it is evidently intended to combine work and play in such proportions that none can have reason to grumble. During the encampment the regiment will be reviewed by Adjt.-Gen. TOWNSEND and the staff of Gov. HOFFMAN, by Major-Gen. SEAGER and by Brig.-Gen. VARIAN.

The citizens of Saratoga are determined to give the regiment a warm reception. As "the Seventh" passes the City Hall, en route to the encampment ground, it will receive from the village authorities, and as there is no military company in Saratoga, the Fire Departments will escort the regiment to "Camp Sherman." The hotels and the leading citizens have united in tendering a ball to the regiment as the Grand Union Hotel, on the 17th day of July, and the expectation is excited all former entertainments of such a character ever held at this famous watering-place. The Seventh will reciprocate this courtesy by inviting the élite of Saratoga to Camp Sherman on Monday evening, July 3, when the camp will be illuminated, a grand display of fire-works will take place, and music and dancing will be the order of the evening. Large numbers of the friends of the regiment are preparing for a trip to Saratoga during the first week of July, and it is safe to predict that it will be one of the most delightful and exciting weeks of the season.

The usual rules and regulations of the United States Army will be adopted:

1. Morning gun at sunrise, reveille sounded, when men will rise for roll-call. 2. Call to meals made by the drums at the guard-houses to coincide with company-calls. 3. Guard-mounting at 9 A. M. daily, except on days for battalion drill, and at 4:30 P. M. for evening parade. 4. The officer of the day will inspect the camp every afternoon. 5. The "sinks" will be cleaned at 6 P. M., followed by 7 taps. 6. All absentees from drill and parade will be reported. 7. Salutes will be fired by the Howitzer Section. 8. The camp to be thoroughly policed to insure cleanliness and healthfulness. 9. Roll-calls to be made of each company according to strength. 10. Directions for guard-mounting. 11. Directions for relieving sentinels. 12. Sentinels on post to be supplied from head-quarters before each guard-mounting for guard rooms. 14, 15, 16. Duties of officer of the day. 17. Flow of the guard and sentinels. 17. Horses paid by the guard. 18. Military courtesy. 19. Non-commissioned officers and privates not to leave camp without a pass. 20. Visitors admitted between reveille and retreat, but at no other time; the guard to be civil and courteous to them. 21. The hour for official business to be 10 A. M.

The Richmond Whig while quoting our recent remarks on the fact that the companies of the Twenty-second Regiment, National Guards, had resolved to visit that city says, "A letter has been received here (Richmond) from a member of the regiment stating that none of the companies will come." Notwithstanding this statement, our information received officially, is to the effect that the five companies, under a field officer, will visit Richmond, as we have before stated.

Lincoln Guard, Company I, Eighty-fourth Regiment, National Guard, on Thursday, closed their drill season with a promenade concert and Strawberry festival, in their armory, corner of Broadway and Fort Greene Place. The drill-room was handsomely decorated in military style, and the music was led by Band-master Collins. The fair sex was well-represented, and presented a dashing appearance during both the promenade and the dance. Capt. Joseph McKinley, Lieut. H. B. Longuir, Sergt. Arthur Taylor, Lieut. Lewis Nash, with the men of the Company, did their best to add to the comfort of their guests, among whom we noticed Capt. Head, of Company E; Capt. Douglas, of Company K; Capt. Kerr, of Company F, and several members of Company B and other companies.

Gen. Woodhull, commanding the Ninth Brigade, notwithstanding the desire of the Albany City Council to suppress all celebration of the "Fourth," has ordered out his command on that day for parade, the special exercises to take place at the Capitol.

The First Brigade of New-Jersey National Guard will parade at Newark on Thursday afternoon next, the line to be formed on the east side of Military Park.

A regiment of Militia is in progress of organization at Chicago.

The Savannah (Ga.) Republican publishes a list of the officers of the military organizations of that city since the re-establishment of the militia. They comprise the following bodies: The Republican Blues, Savannah Volunteer Guards, Phœnix Riflemen, Chatham Artillery, Georgia Hussars, Jasper Greys, Oglethorpe Light Infantry, Savannah Cadets, Germania Sharp Shot, Johnston Light Infantry, &c., with two military brass bands.

The Commissioners of Prospect Park have invited Col. Randol, commanding Light Battery E, First United States Artillery, to give an exhibition drill with his battery, on Tuesday next, at 4 o'clock P. M., weather permitting. The battery will be in line and the reviewing movement in "line right mounting the pieces and carriages, mounting caisson and piece, formations in battery—with firings, changes of front in battery.

The Proposed Visit of the Twenty-Second Regiment to Richmond—A Hospitable Welcome Assured.

From Our Own Correspondent.

RICHMOND, Va., Tuesday, June 18, 1871.

Won't your military editor come to the relief of our much-disturbed First Virginia Regiment of Volunteers! Here have they been agitated for, lo, these several weeks past by vague rumors of a visit from the New-York Twenty-second Regiment. In the meantime they have had no official information in regard to the matter at all, as to who, if any, are coming, how they are coming, nor when. The consequence is that all the plans of the regiment here, and of its companies, in regard to their own projected excursions, &c., are in suspense and confusion, and nobody knows whether to make any preparations to receive the Twenty-second Regiment or not, nor when to expect the visit.

It is certain that any body of military from the City of New-York will be heartily and hospitably welcomed here both by our soldiers and citizens, but we surely ought to have some definite notice, as we are not in a condition, pecuniarily or otherwise, to receive a surprise party. Several companies of the First Virginia Regiment have partially matured their arrangements for a trip to Fortress Monroe, Norfolk, Portsmouth and Cobb's Island, but they have paused to await further and fuller information from New-York.

By the way, I see it stated in the TIMES that the Twenty-second Regiment received an invitation from the First Virginia Regiment to pay the projected visit, and I believe that a letter purporting to be from Gov. WALKER, urging the visit, was read at one of the meetings of the Twenty-second. Now, while some of those things are necessary to justify a visit to Richmond, where the Twenty-second Regiment will be just as welcome, coming on its own motion, as if upon urgent solicitation, it is proper to say that no such invitation has been given, and no such letter has been written by Gov. WALKER. But the Governor and the regiment will be glad to see the Twenty-second Regiment, and we will all do everything to show that we are no longer enemies and rebels, but friends and fellow-citizens. Yet, if the Twenty-second is coming, let us have some official notification of the visit in due time.

Kite-Flying by the Chinese.

From the Virginia City (Nevada) Enterprise, June 14.

The Chinese yesterday opened their kite-flying season by sending up some of their eolian or musical kites. These kites being strung with catgut give out a musical sound which can be heard to the distance of half a mile. They have kites resembling hawks and eagles, cylindrical kites, kites with and without tails, and in fact every conceivable kind of kite; and the amount of comfort they take in flying them is astonishing to "outside barbarians." A whitened old man, who would seem to have no thoughts but of the amount of "filthy mare" requisite to keep him alive, will sit for hours holding his kite-string and manipulating it as happy as a school-boy. The Chinese have a passion for flying kites, and in some places it becomes a regular nuisance, as in San Francisco, where at times so many of the unusual kites are in the air that the noise made by them becomes almost unendurable. The Chinaman is content to sit in some shady nook and watch his kite as it soars and soars aloft, carrying with it the written prayer which he generally sends up to be carried away by the messengers of the gods.

☞ Throughout the Presidential canvass, we shall publish fuller reports of meetings and conventions in each State than any other New-York journal. Very full dispatches will be forwarded by telegraph, supplemented by careful letters. Our desire is to place before the public the latest and most trustworthy information, and we have made ample arrangements for that purpose.

The following from the Evening Post of yesterday may help to reassure Democrats who are concerned about the waning prospects of a "straight" nomination at Baltimore. It may serve, also, as a seasonable reminder to Republicans, of the precise issues into which the Presidential contest has resolved itself:

"The party will make a straight nomination at Baltimore in putting GREELEY's name at the head of the ticket, the very straightest nomination possible, for it proposes thereby to reinstate the old party organization in power at Washington. Yielding nothing, compromising nothing, acknowledging nothing, promising nothing, they have captured a feeble old man, whose desire for office is almost an insanity, and who, to compass it, is ready to turn his back upon the record of his whole life; and on the supposition of his popularity with his own party they propose to capture Republican votes enough to put themselves into power. Whether they will succeed in carrying such a scheme as this to a successful termination, or whether, succeeding in it, they will cheat GREELEY or GREELEY cheat them, is another question. But cunning as GREELEY is—and an unfathomable cunning is one of his strongest characteristics, as it is always of the class of men to which he belongs—we believe he will be no match for the men into whose hands he has delivered himself. A share of the plunder no doubt will be thrown to the hungry adventurers, men and women, whom he would carry to Washington; but a share of political power—not a bit of it."

We trust that Mr. GILSEY and the few other members of the Board of Supervisors who are sincerely desirous to carry out measures of reform will shortly let the public have some definite report about the armory-lease swindles, and how far they have been able to reduce them. At yesterday's meeting of the Supervisors' Committee on this subject, reference was made to the unoccupied armory on Twenty-seventh-street and Ninth-avenue, for which eighteen thousand dollars a year is paid, and to that at the corner of Broadway and Fourth-street, for which $14,000 a year is paid. The former is the property of Mr. F. A. PALMER, City Chamberlain, to whom the Tammany leaders paid an exorbitant rent for this empty loft that nobody wanted, in recognition of his invaluable services as President of the Broadway Bank. The second of these vacant armories is situated in a building controlled by the Howe Sewing-machine Company. From them, a Mr. LEVI STOCKWELL is understood to lease the rooms at $3,000 a year. As he gets $14,000 rent from the City for them, Mr. STOCKWELL apparently derives a nice little income from this transaction.

Two men killed by an explosion in Chicago; twenty-three men injured, some of them fatally, by an explosion in this City; nine killed and sixty wounded by a railway accident in Canada; such is the list which our readers find before them this morning. It is a curious fact that railway and boiler accidents occur more frequently in hot weather than in the cooler season. One reason of this probably is that the excessive heat renders engineers and firemen less watchful and more prone to neglect their duties than at other times. Still, this would hardly account for the frequency with which horrible accidents take place in midsummer. The explosion in this City was of a novel kind, and does not appear to have been in any way the result of carelessness. Precisely what was in the carboys that exploded is not yet certain, but it is by no means impossible that the action of the heat upon the chemicals which they contained may have been the direct cause of the disaster.

In New-York, last week, 641 deaths were recorded, being equal to an annual mortality of 35.5 per 1,000, as against 629 deaths equal to 35 per 1,000, for the previous week. Fearfully high as our death-rate continues to be, it is some consolation to know that the streets are being pretty steadily and well cleaned. Let the Board of Health see to it that the seeds of pestilence are not allowed to be developed amid filthy interior surroundings where the Street-cleaning Department does not penetrate, and we may shortly expect to see some material improvement in the vital statistics of the City.

A Precocious Set of Reformers.

When a body of men dub themselves "Reformers," and ask the people to believe that their political ascendency is all that is needed to bring about an era of purity and efficiency in every branch of the public service, their pretensions naturally invite the most searching scrutiny, alike into their past record and into the methods which they employ to carry their "principles" to a successful issue. Men whose entire political capital consists in their claims to set from higher and purer motives than their neighbors, ought to be above reproach. In a political canvass we expect to see them guided by the most scrupulous regard for truth and honesty, else how are we to expect a display of such qualities from them when they are intrusted with the affairs of the nation. If, in seeking for success, they say one thing and mean another, if their associations belie their professions, and if, while secretly detesting or distrusting the candidates under whose banner they fight, they yet continue to openly recommend them as worthy of popular confidence, they need hardly complain if the unsophisticated common-sense of the nation should rate their "cause" as a mere pretense, and themselves as arrant humbugs.

Yet this is precisely what men like Senator SCHURZ and the "Reformers" who support Mr. GREELEY have been lately doing. They did not seek to conceal their deep disappointment and chagrin at the Cincinnati nominations. They were "humiliated," "bowed down," and a great many other things, too well known to need recapitulation. So lately as Thursday last these same "Reformers" indulged in some very hard speaking at the expense of the Tammany candidate. According to the Evening Post, a competent authority on this matter, the speakers at the "Conference" of Thursday "were unanimous in the expression of their dislike of Mr. GREELEY, we might almost say their loathing of him." Further, says the Post of yesterday:

"Of these Democrats who were the advocates of the Greeley nomination, not one of them, it will be observed, could speak of him in other terms than those of the most marked contempt, almost of loathing, for that much they evidently felt was due to their own self-respect and sense of decency."

For a crusade in favor of party and administrative reform, this is rather a peculiar beginning. HORACE GREELEY, say the "Reformers," is everything that we don't want and represents everything that we abhor, but, for certain personal ends of our own, we desire to make him President. A position like this involves a deliberate insult to the popular understanding, which the people are very likely to resent. A pretty set of men are these to give us a reign of political purity, whose very first act is to indorse one of the most corrupt and shameless political bargains that the record of any party can show! It affords a truly encouraging prospect for civil service reform and administrative purity generally, to find some of their noisiest advocates engaged in the attempt to prove that, though honest convictions may be very desirable things up to a certain point, there is a point where they must give way to the superior considerations of self-interest.

It is possible to accord a certain amount of respect to the position of the little band of uncompromising bolters who have tendered a Presidential nomination to Mr. GROESBECK. They at least have placed on record their opinion, that the service of Reform is quite incompatible with a sustained effort to act a lie. The men who have allowed FENTON to lead them by the nose, can point to no such display of manliness. "A sense of self-respect" prompts the one section of "Reformers" to abuse the Tammany candidate in private, while publicly inviting people to support him. The other and more reputable members of the malcontent Conference have given a more intelligible evidence of the value they place upon their own self-respect, by repudiating the Fenton-Greeley-Hoffman alliance altogether. We need hardly say which side has the greater claim upon the respect of the public.

Marriage Vulgarized.

June is the chosen month for weddings, and the number of these interesting affairs that have taken place lately is simply prodigious. Thirty-five in one night last week is the astounding total for this City and Brooklyn, according to one of the organs of the genteel world. Wedding favors fill the streets as though there had been a June snow-storm, sextons and ushers are well nigh distraught, ineligible young men and women tremble lest all the desirable partners shall presently be married off, while, per contra, even the most hopeless of old maids plucks up heart of grace and trusts that in the prevailing epidemic she may be married by mistake.

It is a pleasant fashion and appropriate enough to the season. At no time more fitly or more auspiciously than under these soft June skies could young love's voyage begin. But there are certain local customs connected with the manner of casting off and weighing anchor for the trip that we should like to see amended. We have spoken before of the offensive glare and ostentation which attend so many church weddings, and detract so much from the tender impressiveness of the ceremonial. But this is a matter within the control of the contracting parties themselves. What they cannot so well avoid even by the exercise of the greatest care, is the glare of the reporters and vulgar publicity given to all their movements and to every incident of the marriage by the so-called society newspapers. Perhaps the most disagreeable of these manifestations has taken the shape of cataloguing the bridal presents with their known or estimated values, like goods at an auction, and this even in the case of people who are otherwise respectable and have no connection with politics. What aggravates the impertinence, is the reasonable suspicion that the information is furnished by the family who may have committed no other sin against good taste than the grave one of displaying wedding presents to the eyes of strangers at all.

Against this sort of intrusion, utterly distasteful to all persons of refinement and sensibility, there is apparently no defense. Reporters are systematically sent to weddings who demand names and particulars as a right, and who, if these are denied, are quite as apt to draw on their imagination for their facts. Of course there are vast numbers of people snobbish enough to delight in this vulgar consequence. Without them the society papers could not exist. But others who resent the insolence and detest the vulgarity are equally exposed to its infliction. Very few, it is safe to say, have been deterred from marrying by this precise apprehension, but the practice we may be sure has cast a shade of mortification over more than one June wedding that should otherwise have been as cloudless as the smiling skies.

A Cool Subject.

While the various European expeditions are trying to get at the North-west Passage and the Open Polar Sea by way of the Old World, an enterprising philosopher, M. PAVY, is going to try his fortune by way of the New. He has either started, or is just about to start, from San Francisco for this purpose, and hopes to be able, before long, to demonstrate the truth of his cherished theories. M. PAVY believes that the polar centre is an open sea in Summer and Winter, and that it is surrounded by a belt of ice. This belt, however, he conceives, is perforated by a channel traversed by a warm current from the south, and through this channel the Polar Sea is alone to be reached. Now, through Behring's Straits a warm current flows to the north, and no such current can be found flowing in that direction anywhere else. Consequently, by way of Behring's Straits alone the path to the Pole must lie, and can be traversed. If we understand M. PAVY's theories, he does not deny that there may be openings to the polar region other than the one north of Alaska; but he affirms that those to the east, between the shores of this continent, Greenland, Spitzbergen, and Nova Zembla, are impracticable. The reason is, that beyond certain latitudes powerful currents are met, sweeping down from the north, and bringing drifts of ice through which no ship can be navigated. Hence, explorers on that side have usually been led to believe that the polar centre is a solid field of ice, instead of, as M. PAVY would have us believe, a huge basin of warm water.

To support his singular theory, M. PAVY brings some highly-ingenious arguments. In the latitude of 80°, he says, and southward, land birds are seldom known to tarry, in consequence of the extreme cold; but they have often been seen winging their way southward over this frigid belt, and, in higher latitudes, have been seen swarming in great numbers. Again, the whale, in the northerly seas, passes further north instead of south at the approach of Winter. It is incapable of living beneath a frozen surface, and hence its habit of migration argues the existence of an open sea about the Pole. If it be asked, admitting these and cognate facts to be true, why it should be warm and open at the Pole, any more than there should be a mountain of ice-cream in the middle of South Africa, M. PAVY is ready with an answer. It is our old friend, the Gulf-stream, again. That extraordinary current, our philosopher declares, sinks as it expands, and meets the current from the north. The latter being colder, heavier, and more powerful, slips quietly over the Gulf-stream, which, nevertheless, keeps obstinately on its course, and, having taken a "header" somewhere about Labrador, comes up in the neighborhood of the Pole. Thus the moderate temperature and open sea claimed for that region are brought about; and here, too, is the explanation of most points touching the circuit, or ultimate destiny, of the Gulf-stream.

From theory M. PAVY proceeds to practice. His intention is to pass through Behring's Straits and then take a northeasterly course to Wrangle's Land, north of the coast of Siberia. This land he believes to be a continent which stretches away toward the Pole and thus merges into the warmer climate he expects to find. It will be remembered that the Russian Government undertook to explore Wrangle's Land in 1819. First, the expedition went as far as practicable in their ships. They then tried to reach the coast by sledging over the ice; but on each occasion the progress was interrupted by the ice growing thinner as they went north until they came to open water. M. PAVY thinks that he has provided for all emergencies. He hopes to get to Wrangle's Land by the 1st of September. He then, with his party, will resort to sledges drawn by dogs, and reckons that he will occupy the time from the date named until May, 1873, in crossing the continent which he supposes what we call Wrangle's Sound in reality to be. On reaching the open sea he expects to find, he will launch his india-rubber raft—an affair specially constructed for the purpose—head his sails, and make straight for the Pole. Having attained it, and triumphantly vindicated his theories, M. PAVY will pass, with the great polar currents, as he expects them to flow, south-east for Cape Alexander, through Smith Sound, down Baffin's Bay, and so out into the Atlantic.

If M. PAVY succeeds in establishing the truth of his ideas, it will be a splendid addition to geographical and scientific knowledge, and if he succeeds in carrying out his plan, the achievement will hardly be short of miraculous. But, alas! the history of Arctic exploration, so full of magnificent endeavor, of sanguine inspiration, of bitter mistakes, of cruel suffering and of untimely death, warns us not to be too hopeful of the efforts of those who propose to lengthen out the chronicle.

Theatrical Privileges.

Applications to have the price of a seat refunded, on the score of dissatisfaction with the performance, are not altogether unknown at theatrical box-offices. How often they are complied with we do not know, but to the maker of such a demand it no doubt seems natural and reasonable in the extreme. He has been seduced into entering the theatre in the full expectation of being entertained. In all probability, this just anticipation has been heightened, if not created, by that deceptive splendor of rhetoric in bill, poster or advertisement, wherein theatrical managers, as managements, are prone to indulge. So the seeker for amusement is led to believe that the "new American comedy" he is about to see is the most brilliant and incisive of all comedies since ARISTOPHANES, or that the original American tragedy, by a New-York gentleman, is the most thrilling and pathetic production since SHAKESPEARE. In this comfortable belief he goes to the theatre, pays his money—not without reluctance, after having moved heaven and earth in vain to procure a free pass—and enters with the consoling hope that he will at least get his money's worth in laughter or in tears. But when he finds that the tragedy is uproariously funny, or that the comedy makes him weep, it seems a clear case of false pretences. He has not got what he was assured he would get, and he will have his money back.

This is the reasoning of more theatre-goers than might be supposed. Of course, the obvious answer is that the modern art of dramatic criticism is calculated to obviate the possibility of just such delusions, by pointing out to each reader what each particular play is, and whether or not it is what he wants. But, on the other hand, many theatre-goers never read the papers at all, and go to each new spectacle the blind victims of rumor and the play bills. To these, a drawback from the theatrical treasury seems a justifiable demand, and the natural remedy for their disappointment. And so far as they have been misled by the alluring eloquence of the posters, the reasoning is correct enough. But in most cases the remedy lies further back, and goes to the dramatist, not the manager. When a play fails now a days in any well-appointed theatre, it fails usually because of its inherent badness, and in spite of careful acting and handsome mounting. To the author then, and not to the theatre, should the outraged play-goer look for redress and compensation.

It is the proud distinction of an Italian gentleman named BERTANI—Signor PROSPERO BERTANI—to have first perceived and put in practice this important truth. On the 2d of May he took the trouble to go from Reggio, where he lived, to Parma, to see VERDI's latest opera, "Aida." He came away in a state of uncertainty, hardly knowing whether he was pleased or not. To satisfy these doubts, he went again, and concluded, as he stated frankly in a letter to "his dear VERDI," that he was not pleased.

"That 'Aida' is an opera in which there is not a single place which takes one by storm, or inspires one with enthusiasm; that without the outward paraphernalia no one would be able to sit it out to the end; and that, after having had the run of two or three stages, it will at last be consigned to the dust of bookshelves."

Naturally for this conscientious and candid mind upon such a decision there was but one thing to do, and BERTANI, being moreover, as he also informed his dear VERDI, a bilan fanatico, promptly did it. He sent to "his dear VERDI" a bill of expenses to the following effect:

	f.	c.
Railway ticket from Reggio to Parma	3	50
Ditto back	3	50
Theatre	3	00
A bad supper at the station	2	00
	15	50
Bile	15	50
Sum total	31	00

To this reasonable demand, the composer at once acceded, barring the item for supper, which he resisted on the ground that BERTANI might have supped at home. Herein he seems to have been in error, since the opera was evidently the direct occasion of the supper. But with that exception, the account was paid at once by an order on VERDI's publisher, on receipt of a stipulation from BERTANI that he was never more to see a new opera by the author of "Aida."

The example of Signor BERTANI seems worthy of being followed. If every one similarly outraged exacted a similar redress, we should have fewer poor plays or operas, and certainly many poorer playwrights and composers.

Fiction Wounded on Wall.

A contemporary, whose fortunes have of late, it report speaks truly, been on the wane, some time since adopted, possibly as an expedient to whip up a dying horse, the plan of establishing in London a "correspondent whose work it was to furnish its news columns of fiction founded upon fact. The ingenious gentleman who undertook the task has unquestionably formed himself upon a sound model. Let any one take down a volume of WALTER SCOTT, and read, what probably he has never read before, the preface, and he will learn how richly the great novelist contrived to dress up out of his imagination mere skeletons in the way of actual fact.

An example of similarly cunning craftmanship was exhibited in the pages of our contemporary the other day. Two columns were devoted to the life and death of the Duke of BEDFORD, and if the Duke could but come to life again, he no doubt would be greatly gratified to find what a romantic being he had become in Transatlantic story. We are introduced to a mysterious recluse, of fabulous wealth, domestically ruled by a low-born woman of great beauty, who has acquired absolute sway over the dotal mind. It is darkly hinted that this person "could an' he would," tell a startling tale indeed; and, before we have done speculating on these mysteries of London, we are plunged into a story of feminine wiles, and given to understand that it is more than likely a secret marriage may turn everything topsy turvy in Woburn Abbey and Belgrave-square.

It is a fascinating tale, and we doubt not that many millions' apprentices devoured it eagerly over their midnight tea; but stripped of the adventitious glamour with which it is surrounded, the history of the late Duke is prosaic enough in all conscience. Every one who knows aught of English history knows that in the reign of HENRY VIII. one Mr. RUSSELL, a Dorsetshire Squire, became through an accident a favorite at Court. Having a remarkably keen eye for the main chance, he obtained and retained grants of abbey lands at the dissolution, to an extent which made him the wealthiest subject in England. One of his descendants distinguished himself greatly a century later as a patriot, and died for his principles. And many other members of the family have been eminent in the public service.

The sixth Duke, father of the well-known statesman, Earl RUSSELL, had one other son by his first marriage, who became seventh Duke, and he had an only son, who died three weeks ago, and whose biography has been written by no blowing a hand. This nobleman, Afterward eighth Duke, was of a feeble constitution, and most painfully shy. Some years before his father's death, he resigned his seat in Parliament, and led a perfectly retired life. BUNSEN, when Prussian Minister in England, writes to his wife the day after a visit of some duration at Woburn Abbey: "The grief of the house is the abstraction of the Marquis of TAVISTOCK, who writes daily most intelligent papers on political subjects, but will not live at Woburn, nor take any part in active life." This nobleman, early in his career, did what we fear is too common to be deemed romantic, viz., formed what Mrs. GROTE euphuistically described in her Memoir of Ary Scheffer, "an exclusively and satisfying family connection," with a lady to whom he became most deeply attached, and with whom he maintained relations until her death.

It may be easily conceived that to such a man as we have described, attention to town property would be very distasteful, hence the Duke left matters very much in the hands of an agent who had been at one time serving his apprenticeship in a solicitor's office. But, in fact, the Duke's affairs were principally under the control of the person of all others in whom such control could most properly be vested—his cousin and heir, Mr. HASTINGS RUSSELL. With an entire absence of that miserable jealousy which is so often found in men, especially in England, toward their heirs, he not only gave his cousin an income of $40,000 a year, but placed Woburn Abbey at his disposal for the Autumn months, and begged him to ask any guests he pleased, all expenses being paid by the Duke.

Such, stripped of adventitious attractions, is the history of the eighth Duke of BEDFORD. If his ailments prevented him doing much good, he probably did far less harm than that predecessor to whom JUNIUS wrote in 1769:

"Consider the character of an independent, virtuous Duke of BEDFORD; imagine what he might be in this country, then reflect one moment upon what you are."

In 1848, we turn to a pleasanter picture of the House of RUSSELL, when BUNSEN writes:

"I have reflected much on the position of a Duke of Bedford or Sutherland in the nineteenth century, and I do not think it could be essentially more than what the present representatives make of it."

There is good reason to suppose that the present Duke will follow in the footsteps of his predecessor last referred to.

"The classic book," which the same accomplished German Ambassador to Vienna," is the historical and political history of the House of RUSSELL."

Such associations make the RUSSELLS still more interesting to Americans, and have caused us to devote this space to them today.

A Source of Wives.

Before the war, we were frequently told that the Southern woman was fully as superior in all respects to her Northern sister, as the Southern man was to the Northern mudsill. In those days the South had not tried the terrible tragedy of war, and was in the habit of amusing itself with the perpetual performance of a burlesque of mediæval chivalry. Its men were, in their own estimation, the knights of the nineteenth century, and as such they occupied themselves to a considerable extent in the chivalric sport of shooting and stabbing one another, and in violent protestations that the daughters of the sunny South, "whose peerless in beauty and endowed with warm passionate natures, that made them infinitely the superiors of the cold and calculating women of the North.

There may, however, be an excess of these admirable qualities in woman, and the recent experience of a gentleman of New-Orleans, who married two daughters of the South, proving the belief that a too passionate woman is not always an unalloyed blessing, this gentleman has procured a divorce, about a year since from his first wife, and had married a second wife, whose sincerity which has so often proved that the average divorced man is deaf to the teachings of experience. The honeymoon was in its first and brightest quarter, and the divorced wife was in quarters unknown, so that unalloyed happiness may be supposed to have been the lot of this New-Orleans person. One morning, however, he went out of his house, leaving his wife alone in her room, and unprotected except by the presumed presence, somewhere in the neighborhood, of the Irish cook. No sooner had he turned the corner than the divorced wife appeared in the presence of her successor, with a suddenness calculated to set her heart in a flutter with the occult powers that, in the theatre at all events, lend unexpected people to the curtain through wholly unlooked-for door-doors. The new wife was first made aware of the arrival of the intruder by a pistol-shot, which narrowly missed her head; she promptly turned and seized both her enemy and the pistol. The struggle was a fierce one, each passionate daughter of the sunny South doing her utmost to obtain sole possession of the weapon. In the contest the pistol was broken, and the aggressor, with a knowledge of capabilities of fire-arms quite unusual in her sex, at once abandoned it in favor of a bottle of bay-rum, which she broke over the second wife's head with immense effect. Greatly inspirited by the success of her change of tactics, she seized upon the numerous toilet articles, and by a rain of brushes and bottles speedily overpowered her, for she had just smashed a glass globe upon her conquered enemy, when the Irish cook arrived on the scene, and gallantly rushing into the fight, made a diversion, during which the first wife escaped, to be almost immediately followed by the unconquered but ludicrous cook. Left to herself, with no enemy within reach, the divorced wife was, for a moment at a loss for amusement. The discovery of rum, however, revived her spirits, and by the aid of this weapon, she proceeded to execute the process known in the South-west as "clearing out the ranch." She left not a stick of furniture nor a strip of curtain or curtain unpinned, and when the police finally called upon her, she was sitting like a feminine Marius amid the ruins of a domestic Carthage.

Now, although the actors in the melodrama were of the "first families" of Mississippi, it would be grossly unjust to draw the conclusion that all Southern women are capable of the Berserk fury of this divorced wife. Still, we have here an instance of what the hot blood and passionate spirit, which we have so long been told is the peculiar charm of the Southern women, may accomplish. The cold-blooded, spiritless Yankee schoolmistress, who goes South to earn a hard and precarious living, is incapable of any such magnificent display of passion. And yet, were the New-Orleans person to fearlessly express his present opinion, he would doubtless wish that his first wife had been a spiritless and well-conducted Northern school-teacher, instead of a superbly passionate and regally self-willed daughter of the South.

THE FREE TRADE CANDIDATES.

Mr. Greeley Elects Mr. Olmsted Delegate-at-Large.

The action of the Free Traders, who met in solemn conclave at the Fifth-avenue Hotel on Friday, in nominating WM. S. GROESBECK and FRED. LAW OLMSTED as their candidates for the Presidency and Vice Presidency, caused considerable comment in this City yesterday, as such action was wholly unexpected after the total failure of the "Sore-head" Conference of the day before. The nominations formed the topic of conversation everywhere, and the general opinion seemed to be that the Free Trade Party throughout the country would not receive the movement favorably, especially as the cardinal Conference had ended so disastrously. Mr. OLMSTED made his sentiments known yesterday afternoon in the columns of the Evening Post, by the following card:

"My name was used without my knowledge in the resolutions of the gentlemen who met on Friday in the Fifth-avenue Hotel. They do not commit me in any expression of opinion on my part on the questions of the present political canvass, but while thanking them sincerely for their good opinion, I must express my regret that my name should on any thought if expected to take up as a representative of their requirements one who is so completely separated from the political field, and so much absorbed in professional duties as I am.

Your obedient servant,
FRED. LAW OLMSTED.

NEW-YORK, June 24, 1872.

Our dispatches from Cincinnati state that the nomination of Mr. GROESBECK has not produced much sensation in that city. Nothing thus far contained indicates what course he will pursue with reference to the matter. An impression seems to prevail that if there were a good prospect for him at Baltimore he would give countenance to the new movement, but that he would not permit himself to be used in opposition to the Baltimore nomination.

LETTER FROM THE PROPER.

A Rising Island Grievance.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Allow me to call your attention to a nuisance, which residents of Long Island, going to and coming from the city daily by the "South-side Railroad of Long Island," are subjected to. Four or five days ago, a "manure-train" was placed upon one of the side-tracks near Jamaica, and is necessarily in close proximity to all trains passing. The odor is insupportable, and injurious to health, but it seems to be the intention of the Company to keep these cars on the same spot during the remainder of the summer. Yours, very respectfully, S. H. G.

NEW-YORK, Friday, June 21, 1872.

Then and Now.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

Would it not be well to jog the fast-falling memory of Mr. GREELEY with the inclosed extracts from speeches of his before "that one misfortune" fell upon him, and he became infected with that fatal Presidential "disease"? Was ever a man more truthfully, faithfully pictured than HORACE GREELEY of to-day, by HORACE GREELEY of 1868? W. P. J.

No. 60 WALL-STREET,
NEW-YORK, Friday, June 21, 1872.

In 1868 HORACE GREELEY delivered a lecture at Montreal and received distinguished honors at the hands of the Canadians. In the course of a speech made at a banquet tendered him by the city authorities, Mr. GREELEY said:

"Mr. WEBSTER was not only a gentleman, but he had the elements of moral greatness, and so had Clay as well. He failed only in one respect, and in this respect I differ from him—he wanted to be President (and I don't blame him). (Cheers and laughter.) But for that one misfortune he would have been the greatest man America ever produced. We have seen our greatest man, Mr. CHANNING, make the same blunder. I have seen men who had the disease early and died of it at a very old age. (Laughter.) Gen. HARRISON died at about eighty-two, and up to the day of his death he wanted to be President. No one ever escaped who catches the disease; he was and died in the delusion. Being a reader and an observer at an early age, I saw how it poisoned and paralyzed the very best of our statesmen. I have carefully avoided it, and run away from it, to speak for taste and justice when they needed an advocate, when those who threatened could exhaust no vengeance but you dreaded. So then, I think you are happy in that respect, if in no other, for none of you in Canada expect to become the successor of your country. (Cheers and laughter.) The smaller you are, the more a great Prize and more fearless public men upon perhaps you would otherwise have. We, at least, in our day, have a President about who did not try so be President. He was elected mainly on that account. (Renewed laughter.) Let a public man honestly go forward, saying what he thinks, and though he may not probably be President, he can enjoy a very large measure of freedom of opinion, as well as freedom of action, [hear, hear!] though freedom of opinion is the very last thing that a free people are disposed to concede to their public men."

HORACE GREELEY, in his Trumbull County (Ohio) speech, last Fall, said: "If the Democratic Party were called upon to decide between GRANT and myself, I know that their regard for what they must call principle would induce nine-tenths of them to vote again the country had condemned enemy of that party. Why? I am no decided enemy of that party, even in its most respectable aspects."

THE LIFE OF A TRAMP.

The sun went down behind a strangely mixed bank of fiery-red and slate-colored clouds, and left me with no occupation and no food—and its many secret devices. As the darkness rapidly increased, so my secret devices were being rapidly developed in the basement office of an accommodating friend, in Jersey City. He was absent at the moment, and had left with his clerk that he expected me. That young gentleman, therefore, manifested no surprise when I put in an appearance, valise in hand. But when I displayed the contents of that valise on a chair, and had doffed my clothing, he looked up every minute from the manifold copy before him, and, ignorant of my intentions, regarded me with an air of perplexity which was extremely amusing, and, no wonder! Having stripped myself to the waist, instead of washing myself as he apparently and very naturally expected, I proceeded to ejaculate my five days' unshaven face with water and then to rub it clean of the dust which, conveniently for my use, had been allowed to collect on the window sill; then to stick several strips of dirty disculum plaster over my left temple and eyebrow, though there was not so much as a pin-scratch to protect across the weather; then to array myself in a similar poppy-colored flannel shirt, with a white and yellow spotted pocket-handkerchief by way of neck-tie; then to don an old pair of trousers which had been artistically rent and stain-stained, and patched on the seat and each knee, and in rent the bottoms of them my own holes; and, finally, to throw an old tailed pea-jacket over my shoulders, and to crown myself with a worn, sun-burst straw hat, the brim of which was sorely dilapidated and the band decorated with a blackened short clay-pipe.

"Now, is that day?" I asked, turning to the dumfounded clerk, who was staring at me with profound amazement.

"Well, Sir, since you ask me," he replied, with a broad grin on his face, and inspecting me from top to toe, "I think you look about as like a blackguard as I should care to meet alone on a dark night. But," he added, "what in thunder does it all mean, Sir; why do you assume this extraordinary disguise?" He seemed still more astounded when I told him that it was my intention to walk to Philadelphia as a tramp; to mix with the tramps, to accompany them as one of themselves, live with them, sleep with them in hay-barns, and in their favorite haunts and cribs, and, in fact, to learn all about the "Life of a Tramp." He gazed at me with an incredulous stare, and I believe, half suspected that I had committed robbery or murder—perhaps both—and that I had arrayed myself in this simple and unbecoming, but very efficient, disguise in order to evade the officers of justice. However, when, at my request, he escorted me to the express office, from which I forwarded my valise to Philadelphia, and heard me tell the agent to send it to the care of a well-known newspaper in that city, he, I think, dismissed his suspicions of my being a murderer, and charitably came to the conclusion that I was stark mad. After leaving the express office and passing some distance up the main street we encountered my friend—his employer—who, though aware of the nature of my expedition, did not recognize me and indignantly looked around for an officer—when I purposely ran against him and nearly knocked him into the gutter. One word of explanation, and we were laughing heartily together, and he insisted upon accompanying me to the outskirts of the city—to the beginning of the long embanked road which crosses the marshes lying between Jersey City and Newark.

As I parted from him, the prospect of a nine-mile walk across that dreary swamp was anything but cheering, for there was every appearance of rain in the morning. The heavy clouds had entirely covered the sky; the night had become intensely dark; the damp, chilling breeze soon compelled me to put on my jacket; and as I looked back at the distant lights of the city, it seemed as though I had severed myself from the world. Moreover, I was soon in a position to state, on the very best of authority, that the New-Jersey mosquito season has set in with its customary severity. In my loneliness, I tried whistling "The Girl I Left Behind Me," by a means of sustaining my fast-failing courage; but I soon unconsciously switched off into the far less lively air—and I at once began to think of footpads, ghosts, and other equally unpleasant things. The breeze sighed sorrowfully along the telegraph-wires, playing the most mournful of funereal dirges; and the tall white poles, with their many lofty cross-bars, stood out so gaunt and grim against the black clouds, that my fevered imagination saw in them the horrible roadside gibbets of half a century ago, and I half expected to see and hear the fast-bleaching bones of some quondam Dick Turpin or Jack Sheppard rattling in the chains in which the outraged laws of their country had condemned them to be hung. I lit a pipe and hurried on, and was no little rejoiced when, about a mile further on, I caught up to a small boy who was toiling wearily along under the burden of a heavy basket, and who asked me how far it was to Newark. The company of that useless urchin was a godsend to me, and in my solitude I silently and heartily thanked his mother for her prudence in sending him on so long a journey on such an hour.

"A good on the bridge at midnight
As the clock was striking the hour."

At last our eyes were gladdened by the sight of the lights of Newark shimmering faintly in the distance. On reaching the outskirts of the town I thrust a twenty-five cent stamp into the hand of my youthful traveling companion, wished him good-night, and left him to trudge on to his destination. I bethought myself, for a minute, and, after receiving directions from a wayfarer, I took my way to the Police-station, and was soon registered under an assumed name on the list of transient visitors to that very inhospitable hotel. My welcome consisted of a thorough inspection and interrogation, breathing suspicion in every look and word, by the Sergeant on duty. The sleeping accommodations offered me were, of course, bare, hard pine boards. I accepted them with true Christian humility and thankfulness—the reek and odor of humanity included—and, strange to say, I slept till the sun was above the horizon. I was surprised and glad to see him, for I had fully anticipated a wet day.

Newark is too near the great Metropolis to afford anything in the shape of a fresh study in the casual occupants of its Police-station lodging house. There was the stereotyped accumulation of rags, tatters, and uncleanliness of beggars and bummers, all looking very abject and of one when they turned out into the bright morning sunshine. They quickly sunk off, as though ashamed of themselves, in different directions, leaving myself and one tolerably decently clad, though dissipated-looking young man in full possession of the sidewalk. He looked at me, I looked at him; the operation was repeated two or three times, and then we engaged in conversation. I told him that I had traversed it all the way from Buffalo (heaven forgive me the lie!) and that I was going on to Philadelphia. He said that he had come from Albany, sneaking his way on the freight-cars, and that he was bound for the same destination. Here was a perfect fund of brotherhood. He proposed a drink; I proposed breakfast, and we went in search of an eating-saloon. I was as hungry as a hunter, and soon disposed of a rather rough rump-steak, a dish of very strong tea, potatoes, and bread and butter and coffee to match; my new acquaintance eyeing me lovingly all the while, and several times throwing out very strong hints that he would gladly share my breakfast. I however, obstinately refused to comprehend his meaning, and when I tendered a five dollar bill in payment for my meal, and asked for the change he looked most reproachfully at me. He evidently regarded five dollars as a mine of wealth. On the landlord discovering that he could not and that I was unwilling to pay for the gin cocktail he had had, he was summarily ejected by the scruff of the neck, with the intimation—given in the choicest of rum-saloon language—that he was a dead-beat, pure and simple. When I, a few moments afterward, appeared on the sidewalk, he was blustering to a few rough men. He appeal exciting me to a volume of cheap malloonee a "d—d out o' the way place," and would be — even with me before night. In order to get rid of him I offered to lend him ten cents. He appeared to be entirely satisfied at this mark of confidence on my part, and he promised to repay me the money that same night in New-Brunswick, though he did not say anything about a place of meeting. He fatherly kept his promise, not in repaying me my ten cents, but in carrying out his previously-avowed determination of being "even with me before night." I little dreamed what my short acquaintance with him was going to cost me.

A couple of miles out of Newark I caught up with two Italian organ-grinders and their respective wives, and the little children of one of them. They were journeying to Elizabeth, where they proposed to play away another day of their monotonous musical life, and there to work up, again grinding by day, sleeping under sheds by night, and marching to the next town in the early morning, till they got to Philadelphia. There they proposed to remain awhile, and then go to some watering-place for the season. As they informed me in Italian strongly savoring of the beets of the Piedmontese, and powerfully perfumed with the rankest odor of American raw onions. They only knew a few words of the English language, and they expressed their great delight and still greater surprise, to find that I understood them. This rather startled me. I saw immediately that I had thoughtlessly made a grave mistake. But I got out of the difficulty by easily giving them to understand that I had lately come from Mexico, and that I had there picked up some Spanish. I was never within a thousand miles of Mexico; but it was absolutely necessary for me to make up my role of tramp. Discovery while on the road would have been fatal to the carrying out of my idea.

They were a hungry party, these Italian organ-grinders and their belongings, and, what is more, they had nothing for breakfast. I suggested making a raise on one of the road-side houses, and offered to be spokesman on the occasion. They approved, and I accordingly approached a tumble-looking villa and rapped at the kitchen entrance door. A somewhat slovenly dame, with a tearful cast in one eye, opened the door and proceeded to squint at me as though she would have squinted me out of existence if it had been in her power to do so. "Young woman," I said, in as deferential a tone as I could assume, "be a good soul, and give us a mouthful of breakfast, if it's only dry bread." How swiftly her eye squinted at me as the latter intended immediately to this short appeal! I thought it would have squinted round till it obtained a full view of the inside of her head and remained squinting there in astonishment for the rest of her days. "We never give anything to tramps excepting a drink of water," she said, with all the snappishness that the female tongue can command at will; and without even waiting to hear whether we would avail ourselves of the boon of the water, without even waiting to see she latched the door in my face. I afterward found out, to my surprise, that this is the general rule. People living along the turnpike road to Philadelphia have so long been pestered with the importunities and lachesmell of tramps, that they seem, one and all, to have decided to put a stop to them. They even refuse to allow them to sleep in their hay-barns. I tried many a farm-house, the outside appearances of which, and the size of the surrounding barns and out-buildings proclaimed the inmates to be well to do in the world, but the only result I succeeded in making all the way from Jersey City to Philadelphia consisted of three very stale crullers given to me by a woman at a cottage in the entrance of the village of Kingston.

I traveled with the organ-men as far as Elizabeth. Our pace was necessarily very slow, as they had to carry their heavy barrels in the broiling sun. But I wanted to learn something of their life, and they, too, were "tramps." Traveling organ-grinders, according to their account, seem to have a pretty hard life of it. They hire their organs from rapacious men, and frequently do not earn more than seventy-five cents to a dollar a day; on a wet day, less. Moreover, the labor of carrying about their the strapping on very broad, and the monotony of playing the same hackneyed tunes from morning to night, from week to week, and all the year round, makes their life very wearisome. Organ-grinding is far from being an ennobling occupation; still one cannot withhold one's sympathies altogether from the laborious slaves who do it as their only means of earning a living. I parted from the organ-grinders at Elizabeth, and walked straight through the town on my way to the railroad track, which is the tramp road to Rahway. Part of the track passes through an extensive wood, and I took advantage of the shade to lie down and get a couple of hours' sleep. I was aroused by another tramp asking me if I could give him a chew of tobacco. I found him a very decent fellow. He was a mechanic, who had tramped all the way from Dayton, in Ohio. He had endeavored unsuccessfully to obtain work in the ship-building yards of New-York and Brooklyn, and was going to Philadelphia to try his luck there. One of his feet was dreadfully galled from so long a walk in a badly-fitting boot, and I felt much pity for the poor fellow that, when we arrived at Rahway, I stood him a dinner. He was very grateful, and as we journeyed along the hot, dusty ten miles of road, between Rahway and New-Brunswick, he wrath and again declared that had it not been for that dinner, he feared he must have broken down. At New-Brunswick, I am happy to say, we persuaded the conductor of a freight-train to let him ride to Philadelphia, the conductor, I think, being influenced by my disinterestedness, when I told him that I had no wish to ride myself. The poor fellow gripped my hand fiercely as I parted from him to go in search of some modest eating saloon where I could eat and rest a while before resuming my tramp, having had nothing to eat since I left Newark but some cold beer and dry bread at Elizabeth, which, as I have intimated, I had to pay for.

Having fortified myself with a substantial supper, and refreshed with my two hour's rest at New-Brunswick, I started out on the Princeton road in search of a lodging—free grade and for nothing—for the night. I asked at several farm-houses which I passed for permission to sleep in a hay-barn; but I invariably met with a refusal. Still, I trudged cheerily on in the deepening twilight, thinking, like Mr. Micawber, that something must sooner or later turn up. But, like Micawber, I was destined to be disappointed, and at last began to experience a decided sympathy with the vexed spirit of Mr. Mantalini, and to exclaim, "Demme!" at such successive reverses. About nine o'clock I formed up for refreshed his refusal to allow me to sleep in his barn by informing me that I could not accommodate, as the inn, in the village of Six-Mile Run, about half a mile further on. This former was deceitful and oppressively wicked in his generation. On reaching the inn—the Franklin House—I found that every one and bed was gone to bed, and that the place was in total darkness. I am convinced that the farmer knew that such would be the case. Mr. "Dutt" Williamson, the landlord, forgot to apply for a spirit license this year, and as his sales of liquids are consequently confined to ginger-pop and soda-water, he does not find it profitable to keep his house open long after dark. However, I lay down on a bench under the stoop, and, using my old straw hat for a pillow, I slept for about an hour. But my hard bed and the chilly air soon sent me in search of more comfortable quarters, and I came to an shelter on the bottom of a road-way wagon, in which there was some hay, while above in the open carriage-house of the inn. I curled myself up in the hay, and was soon asleep. How long I had slept I do not exactly know, but I presume it must have been about 1 o'clock in the morning when I heard voices in the carriage-house. "Holy Moses!" thought I, "there is an end of my night's rest." I peeped over the back of the roadway, and I saw four men—one of them the very friend who was to have lent me the ten cents which I had loaned him at Newark. "Hallo, Cap!" he called out, sitting up in the wagon. "Who the hell's that!" was the polite rejoinder. I got out of the wagon, and my friend, at once recognizing me, and expressed his pleasure at seeing me again, though he said nothing about the ten cents. The party were soon seated on some logs, and one produced a large hunk of corned beef, another a loaf of bread, and another some cold potatoes and raw onions, which were rolled up in a newspaper. I was invited to the repast, but having had supper, and being tired with my day's walk, I preferred to retain it my friendly cookery. I fell asleep just as they were beginning to smoke, after they had eaten as much as they wished, having gathered from the conversation that they had stolen their supper from the larder of a farm-house some distance along the road. I was soon awakened by a loud curse, followed by "Hush! you G—d d——n fool," and a silence for some minutes. Thinking that a conversation might be going on among them likely to give me some idea of who and what these my fellow-crusaders were, I lay perfectly still and gradually began to breathe heavily, as though in the soundest sleep. The conversation was renewed in low tones, and judge of my horror when I heard my ten-cent debtor remark: "Mast: the cut broke the bill at Newark; I saw him; he aint drunk, and so don't be afeard yet." "Guess we'll take him with the rest," observed one of the others. "He's pretty round of; suppose we do the job now, and all hands go has a chance of making." said another. "Good beasts," observed the first; "these fellows mean to rob me." I was on the point of springing from the rockaway, thinking to make a dash and limit to my heels, when I recollected that before leaving Jersey City I had taken the wise precaution of sewing $41 in the toe of my sock, and consequently that I had only $2 75 and my knife in the pocket of my trousers. "Is it worth while," I argued with myself, to run the risk of an encounter with these ruffians for so small a sum, especially as I must make a momentary spring from the rear-guard a vehicle to get out of in the dark as a scorn the prices of a dinner? I also bore in mind that I would probably do best a day or even a day's work in order to earn sufficient money to get on to Philadelphia. He eyed me with manifest suspicion, and told me that, though he wanted "a hand all Summer," he could not give me a day's work. From time to time, as I toiled along, in the scorching sun, on that foot-galling Trenton turnpike road, I made similar applications to many a farmer; but they, one and all, refused to employ me for a less period than for the Summer and Fall seasons, a heavy reduction in the rate of my monthly wages to be made if I left their service before the termination of my engagement. The fact is—as far as I can judge—the farmers between Jersey City and Philadelphia are, to use a sporting phrase, "full against" tramps. At all events I found it to be so; for I have never wasted so much studied pastoral eloquence and so much mendacity to so little profit. As I perspired my way toward Trenton, farmers, as professing Christians, had sunk very low in my estimation, and I took the opportunity of seeking nature's refuge from the remembrance of them on the first shady hill-side which, like the oasis in the desert to the tired camel, presented itself, and to my hungry stomach, but to my wearied limbs and wounded spirit. About sundown I awoke, shook myself like a Newfoundland dog on coming out of the water, lit a pipe, and strode into Trenton "like a giant refreshed with wine."

Ah! what a puzzling, mysterious labyrinth is a strange city to a man who feels that he is more than likely to fall a victim of his, for the time being, chosen disincarnate identity. I was lost in Trenton. To all appearance I was a tramp, and a most suspicious-looking tramp—a stranger, as any Trentonian could have seen with half a ward-politically-educated eye; and yet I was an innocent would-be nineteenth-century Don Quixote in search of adventure. I found it.

I meandered around the railroad freight depot, lounged along the tow-path of the canal, carrying a good deal of slung by the way, and finally found myself on the broken bank of the Delaware River, just above the railroad bridge, and immediately under the fall of the mill-race. I sat bathing my burning feet in the gentle eddies which played in the shallow water, and was almost lost in the beautiful picture painted by the last bright colors of the fast-setting sun, as they glinted and glistened on the State House and the surrounding foliage, the house windows, and the upper bridge, and turned the rapid, rushing Delaware into a stream of dull crimson fire—a picture rather for the brush of a Danby than a Turner—when a corduroyed individual, the sound of whose approaching footsteps I had not heard, broke the charm, and bluntly asked me for a chew of tobacco. I do not chew, but I offered him such tobacco—smoking—as I had. "Where yer goin'?" he asked, after a little desultory conversation. "To Philadelphia," I replied. "Not to-night!" he rejoined, interrogatively. "No," I said; and then, thinking he might be useful, I continued: "Say, Cap; d' yer know a cheap sleeping crib round here?" I learned that he was a stranger in Trenton, like myself, but, more to my purpose, I also learned that he had but a few minutes before engaged half a bed, close at hand, for the night for fifteen cents, and that there was one bed still disengaged. In my haste I almost tore my socks to atoms in lugging them on my wet feet; and, pulling on my boots, I hurried off with him to see about securing that one remaining bed.

Passing through an open doorway into a dark and fishily dirty passage, I was introduced to the proprietress of the lodging-house. She was as fearful a looking specimen of the female sex as one would care to behold, much less to encounter. She rather astonished me by answering my inquiry whether I could have a bed or no with the counter question, "Do you mean to get tight before you go to bed?" I gave her the strongest assurances that I did not, and, paying my fifteen cents in advance, engaged—not the bed, as I had expected, but only one half of it. There were three other beds in the room, which could not have been more than fourteen feet square. Two rickety cane chairs, an old broken-down wash-stand, a much-starred looking-glass, and a picture of the Chicago fire constituted the entire furniture of the room. At the wash-stand stood a great brawny-chested fellow, stripped to the waist, washing his shirt, for the first time for many weeks, to judge from the color of the dirty water. I was roughly informed that he had hired the other half of my bed. He looked at me as much as to say, "Three-quarters would be more correct." Having duly inspected my uninviting quarters, and it being too early to take possession of them, I and my fellow-tramp strolled about the town till 10 o'clock, and then returned to the lodging-house. It was an odd scene. All the other lodgers had come in. My bedfellow had hung up his shirt to dry on a piece of string stretched from a nail in the wall to the outside shutter, and, in his stockings and trousers, was already sound asleep. Two dirty-looking ruffians were executing a trombone chorus on the next bed, having neglected to comply with the scrawling notice stuck on the wall above them—"Men will please take off their boots before going to bed." The third bed was occupied by two lads, apparently brothers, and mere boys. They were chatting in a low tone—I could almost say of home; for they had an honest, respectable look about them, and I once or twice caught the word mother. On the remaining bed—the one in which my friend had a half share—sat a man mending his trousers, which had given way for the twentieth time, judging from the number and variety of patches on them. He, too, had been doing some washing, and had his shirt, under-shirt and a pair of woolen socks hung out to dry on a string. He was smoking a short clay pipe, and wished us "the time o' day" as we entered. He shortly began to indulge in a string of imprecations against the clerk of the weather, and expressed his willingness to sell his soul for a glass of beer. Without desiring any reversionary interest in this worthy's future being, I, nevertheless, said that I had fifteen cents left, and was willing to stand a quart of ale, if he would fetch it. There was music in the words. My bedfellow and the two dirty ruffians awoke on the instant and sat up in bed. Just as the amiable tailor had secured the fifteen cents and was holding his finger to the side of his nose as a cautionary signal to me, "Beer! I'm there," exclaimed dirty ruffian No. 1. "An' me too," put in dirty ruffian No. 2, as he stood up, stretched himself, and yawned. "Who said anything about beer?" remarked the deceitful trousers mender. "That's too thin," rejoined ruffian No. 1; "come, hand out." The next moment a rough and tumble fight for the possession of my fifteen cents was in full operation, the kerosene lamp was knocked over, (Heaven only knows why it did not explode!) the landlady rushed in, cursing like half a dozen Fourth Ward natives, and I rushed out. How they settled the matter I did not go back to inquire. I betook myself to a decent-looking little hotel for the night, and by 5 o'clock the next morning was crossing the bridge over the Delaware, 56 to 2nd to Philadelphia.

To my great surprise, I did not meet a single tramp between Trenton and Philadelphia, a distance of twenty-nine miles. This, however, was easily accounted for. I have since been told that nearly all the tramps do that part of the journey on the canal, the boatmen scarcely ever refusing to give them a "cast." When I walked into Philadelphia, at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, I found that I might just as well have saved myself that long, hot and dusty day's walk in the broiling sun.

The four passengers would not hear me when I asked the way. The street-car conductor could not see my desire to ride. The policemen regard me with more than suspicion. My friends at the Evening Star office did not know when I walked in, and the fact gradually but emphatically forced itself on my mind, that I had wasted a day—that I had sweltered over twenty-nine miles of dusty road, to my great mental and physical demoralization, without adding so much as one item or one incident to my experiences of the Life of a Tramp.

The Brooklyn Poisoning Case.

The Grand Jury of Kings County yesterday returned indictments against Dr. THUSH and Mrs. ANDERSON, charging them with the murder of the late Assessor, EDWARD O. ANDERSON.

MUSIC AND GUNPOWDER.

Dear me, what an exceedingly arid and sterile desert of concerts I had to travel through in my early life! Thirty-five years ago was a period of musical quantity without regard to quality. Worthy people would go to a concert at 8 o'clock and listen to thirty pieces, mostly vocal, and live after it. It was the time when we were suffering from the reflected music—employing this term in the same sense as one would for light—as sung by INGLEDON and BRAHAM. I deem it to be quite a misfortune that even to-day all female concert singers are associated in my mind with a dreadfully fat woman who sang songs in a very thin voice. No matter what her name was, for she has passed away long ago, and I suppose that now, etherealized as to size, and with increased resonance of voice, she sings with St. Cecelia.

Why should TENNYSON'S "Queen of the May" forever have lost its charm for me, because it is united with a female DANIEL LAMBERT, whose foot alone would have crushed several square roods of butter-cups and daisies? As a boy, I am sorry to say I have reviled that innocent woman, and in the middle of "Wake me, Mother Dear," have wished her to sleep the sleep of eternity. I remember as a youth, in the society of certain kind female relatives of mine, maiden aunts, who thought I had a musical ear, (now I think of it I had very certainly a physical ear, for they pulled it occasionally,) who being melomaniacs, lugged me along through untold miles of dreary wastes of sound. There was a song her obesity sang, called "Snipe Shooting Through the Snow," which had a much more terrific effect on me than SCHUBERT'S "Elf King." As the theme for an impassioned gust of song, "Snipe Shooting," or "Crow Shooting," might have been an inspiration forty years ago, but nevertheless, even at that early age, there was something so incongruous about it, that I despised it. I recollect the programme—twenty-eight distinct selections—was placed in my hands before the performance, so that I should not bother my aunts with impertinent questions, and that with innocent guile, I had settled on this song as the one which was to be the bouquet of the evening. There, I thought, was something a boy could understand, maybe in the accompaniment, some sudden bang, would represent a gun going off. It was a bitter disappointment, and as far as my memory goes, I think I abused that respectable songstress in audible terms. My declaration, "that she was a big humbug and couldn't sing worth a cent," though not exactly an elegant criticism, I must still at this late date adhere to, and though this was the last time my dear aunts ever treated me to a concert, I am still of the same mind. Reassurances on their part, that my judgment of her was soothing, uncalled for and ungentlemanly, because she was a good mother, sister, daughter, grandmother, were of no avail. Strange to say a week ago, I met an excellent musical critic, who had suffered in his youthful days from the voice of this same ponderous Circe, and the recollections of the inflictions our young ears felt, were just as poignant today as they were then.

There is something quite amusing when an examination is made of the criticisms of forty years ago, with an analysis of the songs of the "Snipe Shooting" character. About thirty-five years ago, there was given an opera at the Park Theatre, called "The Siege of Rochelle," as dead now as the Battle of Prague. The reviewer makes the following remarks in regard to the orchestra: "It was composed of six violins, (some of them not of the best,) two altos, two violoncellos, two contra basses, one flute, one oboe played by a flute, two clarionets, two bassoons, two horns, one trumpet and one drum, making twenty-one in the orchestra, with seventeen in the chorus, and with six principal singers, making forty-four in all, whereas, at Drury Lane, in London, for the same opera, they had a total of 107. In Philadelphia, (goes on to say the reviewer,) in 1790, they had a better orchestra." There is something delightful in the comparison between the New-York orchestra and the one in Philadelphia, before the American musical prehistoric times. Musical criticism, could, however, at that early period, be quite sharp at times. Here is one: "We have never yet heard such wretched music. The question is, was it an orchestra, at all, at all? (Evidently an Hibernian critic.) All it wanted to be more effective was ten more violins, two violoncellos, and two double basses, (because there wasn't any,) and had there been a trumpet it would have been better. To Signor ——, who did his utmost with the trombone, much praise is due; he did all he could to fill up the hiatus. That's for the orchestra. But the singers, we wish they hadn't yee-a-ooed so—yee-a-ouing is not music." But for a criticism as is a criticism, having freshness and novelty, we copy one from the Inquirer of 1838. He speaks of music and concerts in general: "Concerts are becoming quite popular in Philadelphia. This is a wholesome sign. The popular appreciation of music is not only an evidence of refinement, but of sound morals. The dulcet strains of instruments, the sweet intonations of the human voice, salivate the soul, while they," &c., &c.

Who would have thought, however, that the first of the critics, had he been alive now, might have complained of a plethora of sound. The questions of how many instruments should make up a perfect orchestra, and how many a chorus, are the ones now agitating the musical ones. Most unmusical people look on this question in the same light as they would in regard to a pudding. Say a pudding, manufactured of just such a proportion of sugar, eggs and citron, should, if properly compounded, produce the same of a pudding, enough for twenty people, each to have a good-sized slice. Let us though, says the great cook-in-chief, multiply every ingredient by one thousand, and we will have the most stupendous pudding ever seen. But the difference is that only one person can eat just a certain proportion of this gigantic pudding, whereas each ear in this monster concert has to be gorged by an excess of sound, produced by an over accumulation of instruments. What is called timbre or ton-klange also makes a wide difference. In addition to all those acoustical phenomena represented between the lowest vibration thirty-two per second, a deep moan, and the acute ear-piercing sounds produced by 8,192 vibrations per second, there are the same distinctions in the appreciation of the note as there may be in discerning colors. Whether there be a Daltonism in sounds cannot be as yet perfectly decided, but what is very certain is that some sounds are heard by certain individuals which are not by others. But what is very sure is, that in a vast concert hall, no matter how carefully performers are placed, the sounds from one portion of them will reach the ear at a period appreciably different from other sounds. The peculiar sonority of a perfectly-made instrument, or the natural power of a single voice, even in a moderate orchestra, is frequently distinguishable.

If we refer to that best of all authorities, FETIS, the composition of an exceedingly large and powerful orchestra should be as follows:

INSTRUMENTS.		VOICES.
Violins	30	Soprani	30
Second Violins	30	Altos	40
Violas	25	Tenors	40
Violoncellos	20	Bass	40
Double Bass	20	Principals	8
Flutes	4
Oboes	4	Total	178
Clarionets	4
Bassoons	4
Horns	6
Trumpets	3
Trombones	3
Bugles	3
Serpents	2
Drums and Cymbals	5
Total	193

There has been of late somewhat of an inclination to increase the weight of the brass instruments by additional French horns, and sometimes with forte ophecleydes, but, we think, with disturbing effect. What is considered as exceedingly effective is about the proportion of 146 vocalists to 104 instrumentalists, and yet the rule, as far as instrumentation goes, does not seem to hold good in regard to singers. Choruses, without instrumental accompaniments, of five thousand voices have through untiring drill, and a display in a proper locality, been rendered with the most magnificent effect, while the same number of instruments have made a terrible noise, but besides that nothing. The only excellent effect cited in history of an accumulation of instruments is the one recorded as having occurred when Chester was besieged. It was in the reign of King JOHN. He caused, says the old chronicler, "to have all the harpers and minstrels to strike up at the same time, whereupon the enemy fled in confusion." This is exceedingly complimentary to the Welsh, the belonging party, who were the most perfect musicians of that period. Some of the English orchestras at the close of the eighteenth century were quite large. Here is one of 1791:

INSTRUMENTS.		VOICES.
Violins	320	Trebles	160
Violas	80	Altos	92
Violoncellos	60	Tenors	152
Double Bass	37	Basses	159
Oboes	40	Total	563
Bassoons	40
Horns	12
Trumpets	14
Trombones	12
Drums	8
Total	563
Total	1,000

To this add the organ.

Strange to say, flutes are omitted, which is peculiar, though the absence of the clarionet is accounted for by the fact that prior to the French Revolution and NAPOLEON'S campaign these reed instruments were only used in military bands; perhaps it was as late as 1815 before they became a regular part of an orchestra.

That is a quaint heading for a Musical Review, which we found in an American publication of fully forty years ago, entitled, "Music, Beans and Gunpowder." Here, though you have a blending of the most incongruous elements, one may discern an inkling of those more stupendous native efforts, which have just resounded through the United States. Of course, all musical readers are cognizant of the story of that great musician who, in order so trippis an effect, when one hand was on the last notes of the treble, the other on the bass, with both feet on the pedals, gifted with a musical nose, struck with this organ some middle notes of the clavier, and produced a startling result. But the originator of music, beans and gunpowder was, as says our reviewer, a country organist in New-England, in some modest village, where they had no park of artillery, and when telegraph wires and batteries, then unknown, could not give their aid to music. His text to be musically illustrated was, "He gave them hail-stones for fire—fire mingled with hail ran along the ground." Of course he had to draw upon such meagre resources as he could. His diatonic tornado, chromatic cyclone and symphonious storm having been rendered, rather effects were necessary. Just when the grumbling and muttering of the tempest was at its highest pitch of sonority, at a given signal, a number of boys stationed round the building threw dried beans by the handful against the window, and to cap the climax a long train of gun-powder was flashed off. The effect, so says the criticaster of the time, was stupendous. The good people, unused to such a thing, shuddered—yet, goes on to remark the chronicler, unwilling that a single fact should not be portrayed. "Some of the younger people, especially the young ladies, looked for their umbrellas, being unwilling that their very pretty bonnets should be spoiled in the storm."

THE WEATHER.

Another Hot Day—Some Astounding Sales of Soda-Water—The Exodus from the City—Church-Street and South Fifth-Avenue.

Yesterday was almost as scorchingly, blisteringly hot as Friday. During the previous night there had been a fair prospect of rain, and the bright moonlight revealed cumulous clouds piled up picturesquely in every quarter of the sky. But the hopes born then did not survive the dawn, for the sun came up bright as ever, in an almost cloudless sky. The thermometer went up remorselessly higher and higher yet, until it reached 94°, and then it was good enough to stop. After 3 o'clock a delicious breeze set in, which swept pleasantly through the oven-like streets, fanning hot cheeks and fevered heads, and restoring the energies of panting horses. Many thoughtful drivers of a large sponge on their horse's head, and there can be no doubt that this affords considerable relief to the poor animal. It would be a good thing if every driver would have the same kind care of the quadruped intrusted to his humanity. This device would hardly do for men, who work themselves far harder than they would their beasts, and who suffer more from the heat than the animal. Some have a wet handkerchief inside their hat, and others have the handkerchief steeped in bay rum or some perfumed essence. Some put their trust in plentiful application of liquids to the inner man, and swear by Ottawa beer, lager, mineral waters and soda-water. The last is the great beverage. During the last two days one house sold no less than 13,500 glasses. Of these the great majority were of soda, which argues little for the reflective faculties of the 13,500 drinkers. The syrup which flavors the beverage is very sweet and dries the palate and roof of the mouth, making the throat feel more like a thrasher than they were before. Mineral waters on the other hand, quenches the thirst radically with a single draught.

The exodus from the heated City yesterday was another point worthy of observation. Wagons loaded with furniture on the road to Manhattanville and Yonkers were very conspicuous, and it seems probable that those fashionable suburbs are filling up rapidly. The steam-boats along the North River piers were greatly crowded with folks departing for Summer resorts, and fathers and husbands going to spend Sunday with their wives and children. The ferry-boat landings to the west Jersey shore were still more densely crowded, and presented a striking illustration of the manner in which people are forced out of our own City and help to build up neighboring places. Almost without exception all the people going to Montclair, Orange, South Orange, Brick Church, &c., were New Yorkers, doing business here, but who, instead of building homes in the north part of Manhattan Island, had been literally forced elsewhere by the high expense of labor in building, and the adventitiously high rate of land. The steam-boats on the other side, the Sylvan Stream and her rivals, were occupied by gay excursionists also, though they looked more like excursionists than homebuyers.

Though an attempt is being made to improve the sanitary condition of the City, neither South Fifth-avenue nor Church-street has been remembered, and both are of great importance, being respectively centres of poisonous exhalations and situated in the midst of densely-peopled Wards. The garbage is not removed either as thoroughly as it might be, and some regulation might be made to prevent people from hurling a bushel of abominations upon the road just after it has been swept. But before all things it is absolutely necessary that Church-street and South Fifth-avenue should be paved at once.

War Department Report.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 22—7 P. M.—The barometer is highest over the upper lake region. It has fallen over the North-west, where clear and partially cloudy weather and light to fresh and brisk easterly to southerly winds now prevail. Cloudy weather and areas of rain and light to fresh winds are now prevailing from Tennessee to Louisiana and Eastern Texas. Clear and partially cloudy weather over the eastern Gulf coast, with light to fresh southerly and westerly winds over the South Atlantic States, with light to fresh southerly to easterly winds over the Middle States, with light to fresh north-easterly to north-westerly winds over New-England, with lights to fresh easterly to northerly winds, and from Kentucky to the upper lakes, with light to fresh winds. Clear weather at San Francisco; cloudy at San Diego. The rivers have fallen at Cincinnati, Cairo and Memphis.

PROBABILITIES.

Falling barometer, light to fresh and probably brisk easterly to southerly winds and partially cloudy weather for Sunday, north and west of the Ohio Valley; light to fresh winds, cloudy weather and areas of rain for the Gulf and South Atlantic States, and possibly for the Southern part of the Middle States. Clear and partially cloudy weather and light to fresh winds for New-England and the northern portion of the Middle States.

Death of an Early Railroad Man.

From the Boston Traveller, June 20.

The sudden death of Mr. WM. THOMAS has removed nearly the last of those who nearly half a century since were most prominent in the railroad enterprises of the country, and one of the last of the old school of merchants, of which DAVID DENNY, GEORGE HOWE, and others were prominent representatives. He was born in Worcester, and was, we believe, the oldest son of the celebrated publisher of the Farmers' Almanac. He served his time with HOWE & HOLBROOK of this city, and subsequently became a prominent wholesale grocer on long wharf. He was a director in the Western, the Boston and Providence, the Old Colony and Connecticut and Passumpsic River Railroads—the latter of which became the pet scheme. In all these positions, as well as while a merchant and a prominent bank President, he enjoyed the perfect confidence of his associates. In politics he was strictly conservative, and to the latest day of his life held that DANIEL WEBSTER was the greatest and purest statesman in the country. In social life he excelled in those amenities, the counterpart of which in business won for him so much respect and confidence. We believe that JOSIAH STICKNEY and MARK HEALEY are the only two remaining of the men who were associated with him in our early railroad experience.

A NEW DEAL.

Rumors of a Change of Presidents in the Board of Aldermen—Thomas Coman Seeking His Old Position and Power.

For some days past the corridors of the City Hall have been rife with rumors touching the Board of Aldermen, though they did not assume a tangible shape until yesterday. When the Board of Supervisors met on Wednesday it was noticed that the Tammany members were voting with certain members who are known as Reform Democrats, the combination being in a majority, evidently a pre-arranged affair. This majority consisted of Messrs. COMAN, JOYCE, FITZGERALD, CONOVER, McLAREN, MARTIN, WILDER and JOYCE. As Messrs. WILDER, MARTIN and JOYCE had latterly voted and acted independently, their connecting with the other members mentioned was deemed singular coincidence.

Now it is asserted that an arrangement has been made to remove JOHN COCHRAN from the Presidency of the Board of Aldermen, and place COMAN in his old place. The change can be very easily made if a majority can be secured in the Board to vote for the resolution. The object is mainly to secure control of the minor offices, with a view of making the powers of the Board useful to Tammany. As yet there are very few facts at hand to support the rumor now in circulation, though those who have an inside view of the position of the City Hall seem to have very little doubt that some such movement is in contemplation. The developments, if any are made, will be awaited with interest.

THE LINCOLN MONUMENT.

Progress of the Work on the National Monument at Springfield.

From the Springfield (Ill.) Republican, June 19.

The National Lincoln Monument Association has just received from Hon. E. D. MORGAN, of New-York, a remittance of $13,100 contributed by the citizens of that City to pay for the bronze naval group, which is to form one of the leading features of the grand structure now approaching completion. It will be recollected that patriotic citizens of Chicago became responsible, in behalf of their city, for the infantry group. After the calamitous fire which destroyed the greater portion of that city, the Association proposed to relieve Chicago from her obligation. Hon. J. YOUNG SCAMMON, to whom the proposal was mentioned, immediately relieved the offer in behalf of Chicago, and became personally responsible. He was nobly sustained, and the offering comes purified by fire. The cavalry group is assigned to Boston and the artillery group to Philadelphia. The subscriptions from these cities, $15,000 each, have not been received by the Association, but the wealthy and patriotic gentlemen who have the matter in charge will not permit their cities to lag behind New-York and Chicago. One admirable feature in the construction of LINCOLN'S monument, and surrounding it with its splendid works of art, is in the determination of the Association not to begin the work without having more of means for its completion, and to keep out of debt. The disgraceful abortion on the Potomac, called the Washington monument, stood as a warning.

The European Express.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

In the article in your issue of the 21st inst. regarding the extension of our American express system to Continent of Europe and United Kingdom, when applied to Transatlantic service, you speak of it as a new idea. We beg leave to inform you that it is an institution of over twenty years' growth, and was first inaugurated by the Adams Express Company, and afterward purchased by several gentlemen connected with prominent European houses, who obtained a charter under the title of the American-European Express, and have since conducted the business to its present growth and increased facilities.

SATURDAY, June 22—P. M.

The Bank return this afternoon shows a large addition to Loans and Discounts, without a corresponding increase in the general line of Deposits. The Loans are $4,049,500 higher than last Monday. The Greenbacks are drawn down $1,495,100, and there is a decrease of $387,700 in the Gold average. The general line of Deposits is $64,800 less than on the previous return, which would seem to leave over $2,000,000 of the movement of the week unaccounted for. The return creates remark on the street but has no effect upon the Money market, which is 4@5 ₹ cent. to the Brokers, on call loan, and 6@7 ₹ cent. on Merchant paper.

The sales of Gold for the day were at 113⅜ @113⅞ ₹ cent. The speculation in the Gold Room is very quiet, and the calculation is that sales will go below 113 ₹ cent. next week unless there should be stiffer rates of Exchange and the renewal of active Gold Shipments.

The prevailing temper of the Stock market is in the direction of higher prices for the New-York and Western Roads, and the demand to-day, without being very active, was stronger than earlier in the week, and prices higher than on Friday. The business in North-West Stock was large, and also in Lake Shore at firm rates, and the speculation in Erie advanced to 55⅛ ₹ cent. Among the Miscellaneous Shares, Canton Land Company advanced to 102@101½ ₹ cent. In the Southern State Bonds there was another rise on Tennessees to 75 ₹ cent.

At 3 o'clock P. M., the Saturday hour for closing the Exchange, the following quotations were made as compared with Friday night:

GILMER AND GREELEY.

The Virginia Democrat Returns to the Attack—How Greeley Encouraged the Secessionists in 1860-61.

RICHMOND, June 15, 1872.

To the Editor of the Richmond State Journal:

In the Tribune of the 13th inst., there is over a column devoted to the consideration of my letter, published in your paper of the 8th inst. In the editorial, the following language is used, which is the only reference to my statements made in my letter:

"It remained for Mr. GILMER to reiterate and improve upon a stale calumny, by asserting that Mr. GREELEY not only favored secession in 1860-61, but 'urged Mr. DAVIS and his Southern friends to secede.' Thus, you see, a lie, being suffered to pass uncontradicted, not only endures but expands and grows. Let us impale this lone, so as at least to preclude its further enlargement."

Such is the evasive, disingenuous and unpolished denial of the Tribune, couched in rude language as characteristic of high passion as it is destitute of gentlemanly courtesy. The article does not admit or deny the correctness of my citations from the Tribune. I now give you the full extracts taken from the elaborate defense of Buchanan's Administration, written by President BUCHANAN himself, and published in 1866. This controversy has been provoked by the Tribune. It is to be hoped that Mr. GREELEY knew nothing of the article until he saw it in print. I give the full citations of President BUCHANAN, pages 96, 97, and respectfully challenge the consideration of the Tribune to them.

"It, (the Tribune,) on the 9th of November, but three days after Mr. LINCOLN's election, announced such sentiments as these: 'If the South do not like them, they become satisfied that they can do better out of the Union than in it, we insist on telling them go—in peace.' The right to secede is a revolutionary one, but it exists nevertheless. We must ever resist the right of any State to remain in the Union and nullify or defy the laws thereof. To withdraw from the Union is quite another matter, and whenever a considerable section of our Union shall deliberately resolve to go out, we shall resist all coercive measures designed to keep it in. We hope never to live in a Republic whereof one section is bound to another by bayonets." Does the Tribune, or will Mr. GREELEY deny the precision and accuracy of this citation?

Mr. BUCHANAN proceeds: "And again, on the 17th of December, three days before the secession of South Carolina: If it (the Declaration of Independence) justifies the secession from the British empire of 3,000,000 of colonists in 1776, we do not see why it would not justify the secession of 5,000,000 of Southrons from the Federal Union in 1861. If we are mistaken in this point, why does not some one attempt to show wherein and why? For our own part, while we deny the right of slaveholders to hold slaves against the will of the latter, we cannot see how 20,000,000 of people can rightfully hold 5,000,000 of free in a degraded union with them by military force. If seven or eight contiguous States shall present themselves authentically at Washington, saying: 'We hate the Federal Union; we have withdrawn from it; we give you the choice between acquiescing in our secession and arranging amicably all incidental questions on the one hand, and attempting to subdue us on the other;' we could not stand up for coercion, for subjugation, for we do not think it would be just. We hold the right of self-government, even when invoked in behalf of those who deny it to others. So much for the question of principle."

I will not repeat the other quotations cited in my letter on the 6th instant; it is needless. The Tribune, and I presume Mr. GREELEY, has read them. Does the Tribune, or will Mr. GREELEY, deny the full authenticity of these extracts? Has Mr. GREELEY ever denied them except in the Tribune in the Summer of 1869 and its issue of the 13th instant? I regret the ill-mannered and mean turn, (not to use plainer terms, in which the Tribune stamps its own forcible language. If there is a "lie" in this matter, let Mr. GREELEY settle the delicate question with his conscience, his country and his God.

Respectfully,
JOHN H. GILMER.

Cracked.

The matches arranged between the St. Georges and Harvards, and the latter and Manhattans, have fallen through, the collegians not being yet sufficiently organized for play. To-morrow the members of the St. George Club have a club game at Hoboken.

GRANT AND WILSON.

Address of the Massachusetts Republican State Central Committee.

To the Republicans of Massachusetts:

The Republican State Central Committee of Massachusetts, through its Executive Board, as a meeting held at the head-quarters of the party, in Boston, June 20, 1872, determined that it was their duty to make an appeal to the Republicans of the Commonwealth on the opening of the Presidential campaign.

The Republican Party of Massachusetts has reason to be proud of its position. Foremost to organize that great conflict which has resulted in the recognition of freedom and civil rights throughout the length and breadth of the land, devoted always to the honor of the country, setting an example of financial honesty in the most trying hours of the war, and amid all the burdens of peace; demanding a reconstruction of the Government on a loyal basis; earnest for the elevation of the civil service to the purest and highest possible standard; determined on the investigation of all questions of social and civil reform, until government in this country shall mean justice and right and opportunity, to all who are under its control, and until society shall mean freedom from oppression and burdensome distinctions; devoted to the enfranchisement and elevation of all, and realizing that social safety and peace and prosperity can find a sure foundation only on an educated and contented community, this party consequently has the country that its principles and policy have been accepted by the people, and the national political machine is in motion, and the earliest hopes and promises are to be fulfilled by an earnest and intrepid and progressive American people.

A national convention, unequalled in power and enthusiasm, and devotion to the rights of the best representative assembly of triumphant and realized freedom and loyalty and honor ever gathered in this nation—has accepted the highest and most progressive thought of Massachusetts as its political platform. To her early, earnest reformers who could only pray and protest in the darkness in which surrounded them; to her bold political leaders and guides, who began by leading a forlorn hope; to her statesmen, who have manned the watch-towers of freedom from the beginning; to her great war-governor, whose inspiring words and stern demand for humanity and justice made the war great and memorable; to her brave and zealous soldiers, and to her self-sacrificing and loyal and aspiring daughters, a great political party has extended a warm hand, and has opened a sympathising heart. Once again in our history has the patriotic wisdom and fervor of America sent from Philadelphia a generous response to the freedom-loving sentiments of Massachusetts, and as it was in 1776, when the declaration of the defiant patriots of Boston found a national utterance in the great council at Philadelphia, so now the voice of Republican reform, first heard here, is taken up and re-echoed throughout the land in the cry of a great people and the object of all the highest social and civil endeavor in America. In the discharge of its great duty, the Republican Party of this country takes up the work designed by the revolutionary fathers, and pledges itself to an untiring effort for the perfection of the Government of the people, by the people and for the people," and the creation of a nationality founded on "equal and exact justice to all men" of every race and color and condition. The State and district delegates to the Philadelphia Convention went to that assembly generally bearing instructions to vote for the nomination of ULYSSES S. GRANT and HENRY WILSON, as candidates for the two highest offices in the gift of the American people. And faithfully they performed their work. Recognising the high service performed by Gen. GRANT, through his bravery, sagacity and immovable self-possession during the war, and the equally commanding service performed by him through his wisdom and integrity and patriotic desire for his country's good in peace; remembering moreover that it is his devotion to the highest Republican principles which has delivered the nation from the supremacy of disloyal counsels, the delegates from Massachusetts joined heartily in the enthusiastic demand of the Convention, that he should be the standard-bearers of the party once more. It was also a source of pride and satisfaction to them to find (this work having been accomplished) a recognition of the peculiar fitness of HENRY WILSON for the second place on the ticket. His life-long service in the cause of freedom, his unceasing labors for his State and his country during a long Senatorial career, his appreciation of the wants of a struggling people, his unblemished honesty, his sympathy with all reform, his desire to behold in the Administration the highest consummation of the best endeavor of the people to regulate their own affairs,—all combined to attract the warmest regard of the Convention to himself and to the Commonwealth which he has so long and faithfully represented. To the humane and generous platform laid down at Philadelphia, to the ticket there presented,—GRANT and WILSON, the loyalty and courage, and honesty, labor and common sense of the country—the support of the Republican Party of Massachusetts is called. At the Autumnal State Convention, the party will give this ticket a hearty indorsement, and will give the country new assurances of zeal and fidelity with which it will enter upon its work. Meantime, let the watchfires be lighted throughout the Commonwealth. Let meetings for ratification be held in the cities, and towns, and villages; let clubs be formed everywhere; let all personal differences be forgotten; let the Republican ranks close up for the vindication of those who gave us our principles, and of those who maintained them with their blood; let Massachusetts, with her sister States, do her duty once more, and the freedom, and right, and prosperity, and honor and peace and safety of our country, its domestic happiness and its international power will be secured beyond the reach of political designs, or changes at home, and of mischievous combinations abroad.

Alarm in a San Francisco Theatre—Attempt to Shoot the Door-Keeper in the Dress-Circle.

From the San Francisco Alta, June 10.

One of the most contemptible acts committed within the walls of a theatre by one of the audience took place at the Alhambra Theatre last evening. JERRY JONES, a young man about twenty-five years of age, and a pretty rough character, purchased a ticket for the dress-circle, and took the corner seat on the last row of the circle. He seemed to be under the influence of liquor, and during the evening his strange conduct attracted attention. In his hand he held a six-shooter, and at times would read a paper and lay the pistol at his side, very much to the alarm of those sitting near him. His unruly conduct brought up the door-keeper, Mr. JOHN KELLY, who requested him not to disturb the audience. At this JONES became indignant, and replied that he had paid to come in to laugh. A few words passed between the parties, when JONES pulled the trigger of the pistol he held in his right hand, the ball passing through the rim of KELLY's hat, which he held in his right hand. As can be well-imagined, the sudden discharge of a pistol in the dress circle created a lively sensation—ladies fainted away, and the whole house was in an uproar. A cry was raised, "kill him," and in a few moments the fellow was collared by a crowd, hustled down-stairs, and taken to the station-house by officers DEVOY and AYRES, who preferred a charge of assault to murder against JONES. Order was soon restored in the theatre, and the performance was continued, as if nothing had happened.

An Unfortunate Family—Four Members Become Insane at the Same Time.

From the Troy Times, June 19.

Two weeks ago or more a paragraph announced that a man named CRAVEN and his two sisters, who had only recently arrived in this city, all became insane about the same time. The story was strange and sad, and its continuation is more strange and sad. Another member of the family residing as Malone, Franklin County, manifested symptoms of insanity at the same hour the same symptoms were exhibited by the three members residing in this city. The Malone brother soon became a raving maniac, and was confined in his dwelling. On one occasion he managed to secure possession of a pistol, and with it attempted to end his life. One bullet discharged from the weapon cut off a portion of his ear. A day or two ago his friends determined to send him to Poughkeepsie, and he passed through this city today in charge of a keeper. Rev. Father CRAVEN, a priest at the Provincial Seminary, is a brother of the unfortunate parties.

The Peabody Educational Fund.

From the Boston Advertiser, June 18.

The trustees of the educational fund established by the late GEO. PEABODY for the benefit of the Southern States, and endowed by him with more than $2,000,000, are to hold their annual meeting in Boston on the 25th inst. The meeting was originally fixed for the 5th instant, but owing to the absence of an Europe of Bishop MCILVAINE and Mr. EVARTS, and the engagements of President GRANT and Secretary FISH at Washington, a postponement became necessary. Since the original nomination of the trustees by Mr. PEABODY, Hon. WM. C. RIVES, of Virginia, and Admiral FARRAGUT have died, and EDWARD A. BRADFORD, Esq., of New-Orleans, has resigned on account of ill-health. Their places have been filled by election, and the Board is now composed as follows:

Hon. ROBERT C. WINTHROP, Chairman.
Hon. HAMILTON FISH and Right Rev. C. P. MCILVAINE, Vice-Chairmen.
President Grant, Hon. J. H. Clifford, of Massachusetts; Hon. William Aiken, of South Carolina; Hon. William M. Evarts, of New-York; Hon. William A. Graham, of North Carolina; C. Macalester, Esq., of Philadelphia; George W. Riggs, Esq., of Washington; Samuel Wetmore, Esq., of New-York; George N. Eaton, Esq., of Maryland; Hon. Samuel Watson, of Tennessee; Hon. A. H. H. Stuart, of Virginia; Geo. Richard Taylor, of Louisiana; George Peabody Russell, Esq., of Massachusetts.

We understand that Gen. GRANT has fixed his time for attending the Jubilee with the view of being present at the meeting of the Board, and that all the other members who are not in Europe will be present on the occasion. Dr. BARNAS SEARS, the general agent of the trustees, will of course be present to submit his annual report of the operations of the Board in the Southern States. It will be remembered that Mr. PEABODY himself was at the last Jubilee, and was the subject of an enthusiastic reception at the Coliseum. The trustees will probably be in session at the Revere House for several days.

REAL ESTATE AT AUCTION. REAL ESTATE AT AUCTION.

EAST JERSEY SHORE EXCURSION AND SALE.

BY ORDER OF THE STAFFORD LAND COMPANY,

Tuesday, June 25, 1872,

A. D. MELLICK, JR. & BRO.

WILL SELL AT AUCTION

HOUSES, TOWN LOTS, FARMS AND HOTEL,

ON BARNEGAT BAY, AT

MANNAHAWKIN STATION,

NEW-JERSEY SOUTHERN RAILWAY.

The Stafford Land Company propose making this sale one of the most important to those people of the City and vicinity, desirous of purchasing farms or village residences, on the delightful and healthy portion of that section of New-Jersey lying along the coast.

This Company has purchased some thousands of acres of land, principally fronting on the salt meadows in the rear, situated on the western shore of Barnegat Bay, opposite Long Beach, between Barnegat Inlet and Manahawkin Station, on the New-Jersey Southern Railway. The Company have laid out a village at Manahawkin Station, which they intend to make a place of importance in Ocean county. Within them limits, that of the vicinity of New-York, the cost of transportation will be very much less, and lands can be purchased at very much more value, compared with equal distance into the City.

The pleasant homes for parents of moderate means, who do not desire to live in the City during hot weather, but have business to attend to there, can find healthy homes in the village, with good schools, churches, stores, &c., and yet be within easy reach of the City. Trotting at Fleetwood Park—Brilliant Regatta of the Brooklyn Yacht Club—Base-Ball Contests and Notes.

TROTTING AT FLEETWOOD PARK.

An Exciting Trot Yesterday for a Stake of $1,000—Three Horses Start—Castle Boy the Winner.

Fleetwood Park yesterday was the scene of an exciting trot between the ch. m. Grace Bertram, the br. s. Daniel Boone and the b. g. Castle Boy. The stake was $1,000, and after six heats were trotted Castle Boy won. The following are the details:

FIRST HEAT.—After one false start they received the word. Castle Boy went off in the lead, with Boone second, and Grace Bertram third, but as they went round the turn, Bertram went to the front, and showed the way by three lengths, Boone in the meantime breaking and falling, beaten Castle Boy. At the quarter-pole, in 39 seconds, Grace Bert. still leading and four lengths in advance of Castle Boy, who was three lengths ahead of Boone. As they went along the backstretch, Castle Boy closed upon Grace, and but two lengths divided them, while Boone was four lengths behind. When they passed the half-mile pole, in 1:18, Grace still held the command and was leading Castle Boy two lengths, while Boone was closing up and was but two lengths behind. On the lower turn Boone was allowed his head, and closed rapidly upon his competitors, being but a length behind Castle Boy, who was within a length of Grace Bertram. When they had reached the three-quarter pole, Castle Boy had collared Boone, and a spirited contest ensued between the trio up the homestretch. Boone gradually drew to the front, and after a close struggle won the heat by a neck and shoulders—Grace Bertram being second, half a length in front of Castle Boy, who was pocketed between the two. Time—2:35.

SECOND HEAT.—Grace Bertram was still the favorite, and brought $105 against $40 for the other two. On the fifth attempt the word was given, and Castle Boy was first, Boone second, and Bertram third. As they went to the turn Boone passed to the front, but on going round the lower turn he left the track and let Castle Boy went to the front and passed the quarter-pole in 36 seconds, three lengths ahead of Grace, who was a length in advance of Boone. Their positions remained the same down the backstretch, except that Boone had fallen six lengths astern of Bertram. Bertram now got a little closer to Castle Boy, and two lengths divided them as the latter passed the half-mile pole in 1:12¾. As they came on the lower turn Castle Boy got a little further away from Grace, but the latter closed, and but two lengths divided them at the three-quarter pole, while Boone was about four lengths behind. When they came into the homestretch Grace made a fine effort to head Castle Boy, but without success, as the latter kept steady and won the heat by a length in 2:30. Daniel Boone hit himself and made a bad break on turning into the homestretch, and came home about sixty yards behind.

THIRD HEAT.—Grace Bertram was still the favorite, and brought $65 to $35 for the other two. The second attempt was a go on even terms; but at the turn Castle Boy trotted very fast, and rushed to the front, and opened a gap of two lengths, Bertram being second, four lengths ahead of Boone. As they neared the quarter-pole, Boone began to close rapidly upon Castle Boy, and as that point in 36 seconds, the latter led her a length, while Boone was three lengths behind. As they went down the backstretch Bertram caught the Boy, showing but a head's length at the half-mile pole in 1:15. Boone being still three lengths behind. As they came upon the lower turn Grace Bertram passed the Boy, and came to the three-quarter pole a length in front, while Boone came up and lapped the Boy, but broke and fell back again. On turning into the homestretch, Bertram came away, and taking it easy, won the heat by two lengths, in 2:34¾; Castle Boy second, half a dozen lengths in front of Boone.

FOURTH HEAT.—Grace Bertram was now so great a favorite that there was no betting. On the first attempt the word was given with Boone first, Castle Boy second and Bertram third. As they went to the turn the Boy broke and fell back to the third place, Bertram in the meantime coming to the front, and opening a gap of five lengths, Boone being second. Boone trotted very fast, and closed rapidly upon Bertram. At the quarter pole, in 37 seconds, Bertram was two lengths in front of Boone, who was the same distance ahead of Castle Boy. They remained in this position all the way down the backstretch to the half-mile pole, which was passed by Grace Bertram in 1:17. As they came upon the lower turn, Boone began to close upon Castle Boy, and soon lapped the wheel of the latter. Bertram was still two lengths in the lead at the three-quarter pole, when she broke, and the others came upon her. She soon got down to her work again, and kept on the front, finally winning the heat by a length, in 2:31½; Castle Boy second, a length in front of Boone.

FIFTH HEAT.—Bertram kept the lead to the half-mile pole, and then broke. Castle Boy then passed her, and won the heat by two lengths, in 2:32¾.

SIXTH HEAT.—Castle Boy took the lead at the start, kept it to the end, winning the heat and race in 2:33½.

YACHTING.

Brooklyn Yacht Club Regatta—A Victory for the Madeleine and the Meta—Rattling Winds and Good Sailing.

The fifteenth annual and fifth Union regatta of the Brooklyn Yacht Club took place yesterday, under circumstances that were in the highest degree favorable in every respect saving the wind.

The morning opened very auspiciously for a yacht regatta, a heavy haze hung over the water, and not a breath of air stirred. The flags and signals that should have flown from the mast-head fell drooping, as if despondent at the lack of wind to cause them to spread to the breeze.

The entries for the race promised a good one, there being the following:

SCHOONERS.

Madeleine, Brooklyn Yacht Club; Eva, New-York Yacht Club; Maggie and Isabel, Brooklyn Yacht Club.

FIRST-CLASS SLOOPS.

Meta, Gracie, Kate, Mary, Undine and Addie, Brooklyn Yacht Club; Captain, Bayonne Yacht Club; West Wind, Harlem Yacht Club.

SECOND-CLASS SLOOPS.

Twilight, Brooklyn Yacht Club; Undine, Jersey City Yacht Club; Sophia, Qui Vive, Onward, Flying Cloud, Brooklyn Yacht Club; Vivid, Harlem Yacht Club; Emily, Brooklyn Yacht Club.

THIRD-CLASS SLOOPS—(OPEN BOATS.)

Meteor, Favorite, Aquatic, R. E. Mallory, W. T. Lee, Maud, Brooklyn Yacht Club; Jeannette, Bayonne Yacht Club; Oriental, Jersey City Yacht Club.

The steamers W. Fletcher and Magenta had been chartered by the Club, the former for the accommodation of the judges and the representatives of the Press, and the latter for the guests of the Club and their friends and members. At 11 o'clock the Fletcher left Brooklyn and steamed out to Gowanus Bay, where the yachts were all found ready to "up anchor" and away. The sloop Izaac Walton was at once placed in position as stake-boat, and exactly at 12 o'clock the first gun was fired to get ready. Three minutes after the second gun for schooners and first-class sloops to go was fired, and at 12:9:15 the signal for the second-class sloops to go was given. The third-class sloops were started in the same manner at 12:11:52.

As soon as the first gun was fired the Madeline was off, but the Louise was on her heels with the Eva next up. Of the sloops the Captain was away first, the Meta being close behind. The Vivid, Undine, Bella, Jeannette, Oriental and Favorite followed, all close together.

The wind was light from the south-east at the start, but soon after shifted to the south, then shifted south to the north.

The competing yachts all started off with their jibs boomed out, the Madeleine, Meta, Qui Vive and Belle leading in their respective classes. The wind was very light and afforded no chance for the boats that rode heavy. Consequently the light-draught boats went ahead, and passing through the Narrows the Meta, Gracie, Addie, Mary, Captain and Undine led the way. The race between the Meta and Gracie was the most attractive feature of the regatta. Both boats spread all the sail they could carry, but the Meta led throughout the race, eventually winning, after a gallant struggle.

Off the West Bank Buoy they passed in order as follows: Meta, 12:57; Gracie, 1:01:10; then came the Addie, Undine, Mary, Captain, Madeleine, all close together. The wind now died out, and the race, if such it could be called, became a drifting one for fully half an hour, by which time the wind, having sanded round to the north, sorung up, and the boats moved off again. The run to the South-west Spit presented no new incidents, the yachts following each other in the same order. The time of passing the Spit was:—

	H.	M.	S.
Meta	1	39	42
Gracie	1	39	13½
Addie	1	39	13
Undine	1	39	5
Mary	1	39	04
Captain	1	38	4
Madeleine	1	39	31
Jeanette	1	39	47
Eva	1	40	45
Qui Vive	1	43	29
Sophia	1	43	25
Oriental	1	51	39
Undine	1	39	49
Flying Cloud	1	40	3
Maud	1	42	8
Bella	1	42	8
W. T. Lee	1	42	16
Gracie	1	42	20
Addie	1	42	40
Eva	1	42	40
Undine	1	42	50
Madeleine	1	43	00

After passing the South-west Spit, the third-class sloops pointed homeward, while the second-class made for Gedney's Channel buoy, the Meta leading the fleet, with the Qui Vive and Sophia close behind. Two hours of only two boats was taken at Gedney's Channel buoy, when the Fletcher steamed away for the light-ship. The run to the light-ship developed nothing new in the position of the boats, the wind having died out, and a dead calm prevailing.

The time of the yachts passing the light-ship was as follows:

	H.	M.	S.
Meta	3	47	25
Gracie	3	49	20
Madeleine	3	52	10
Addie	3	54	35
Undine	4	15	37
Captain	4	15	45
Flying Cloud	4	27	5
Vivid	4	30	00
Emily	4	37	30
Bella	4	38	8
Addie	4	42	00
Eva	4	42	00
Undine	4	42	30
Madeleine	4	43	00

The following boats were: Schooners—Madeleine, Officers' prize as first boat in of her class and the Club prize. The Eva takes the Union prize for schooners. In the first-class sloops the Meta takes the Officers', Club and Union prizes. In the second class the Qui Vive takes the first boat in, and the Sophia takes the Club and Union prizes. In the third-class the Meteor takes all the prizes.

The judges of the race were Col. M. M. Van Dyke, B. E. Mallory, John M. Sawyer, Capt. S. Samuels, J. M. Weeks and J. F. Ames.

THE BALTIMORES CONQUERED AT BOSTON.

The game between the Baltimores and Bostons, at Boston, yesterday, was closely contested and exciting until the last inning, when the Bostons added 5 runs, and won by 9 to 3. The game was the fourth of the championship series, the last of which takes place at Boston to-morrow. The innings of yesterday's game were as follows:

	1st.	2d.	3d.	4th.	5th.	6th.	7th.	8th.	9th.
Boston	1	0	0	1	0	0	0	3	5	—9
Baltimore	1	0	0	2	0	0	0	0	0	—3

THE CHAMPIONSHIP.

Up to the present time, June 22, thirty-four games have been contested by the SIX "regular" clubs, with the following result:

	Games Played.	Won.	Lost.
Boston	11	10	1
Athletic	9	7	2
Mutual	15	7	8
Baltimore	14	6	8
Troy	11	3	8
Cleveland	6	1	5
Total	66	34	34

NOTES.

To-morrow Athletic vs. Troy, at Chicago, and Boston vs. Baltimore, at Boston.

On Thursday the Mutuals defeated the Enna, of Chicago, by a score of 10 to 2, the amateurs earning all their runs. During the entire game the Mutuals committed but one fielding error.

Pools on the games at Cleveland and Boston were sold yesterday afternoon at JOHNSON'S club-rooms, Broadway and Twenty-eighth-street. The odds on the former game were $100 to $40 on the Athletics; on the latter, $100 to $20 on the Bostons.

The Mutuals returned from Chicago yesterday.

THE INTERNATIONAL RACE.

Story of the Defeat of the Atalantas by the London Crew.

From the London Daily Telegraph, June 11.

* * * One of the stipulations made when the match was arranged, was that in case the wind should blow strongly down the river, the referee should have the option of ordering the race to be rowed from Mortlake to Putney instead of in the ordinary direction. This course was taken in 1858, and again in 1863 in the Oxford and Cambridge matches; but of late years the necessity for any such change has not arisen. Early in the afternoon of yesterday a decidedly strong south-wester swept the reaches of the Thames, driving the more open parts of the river into surf, and rendering the voyage from Putney to Mortlake rather hazardous for light racing boats. Later in the day, and before 4½ o'clock—which was the time fixed for the start—the breeze abated, and there was really nothing to prevent the race from being rowed in the usual direction. Deterred, however, by the aspect of the noon-tide hours, the Atalantas had set their faces firmly against taking the ordinary course; and, yielding to their representations, the London crew, not without some demur, gave way. Mr. LESLEY, the referee, confirmed this arrangement, and the consequence was that the starting-point was changed from Putney to Mortlake. Going some distance beyond the latter village, and approaching Kew Bridge, the official steamers lay together some time before any signs were made of the crews getting into position for the start. Meanwhile, Mr. LORD, acting for the Thames Conservancy, had made good use of the time in clearing the course as much as possible to meet the altered circumstances. The change was altogether in favor of the Atalantas. A light crew in a light boat, and with the wind all in their favor, could hardly have been better situated for a race against heavier men in a stouter boat, whose knowledge of racing downwards from Mortlake was almost as limited as their own.

THE CREWS.

At length, when the tide had some time turned, and the ebb driven by the light wind then astir was running fast, the London men embarked in their Clasper and drew up to their station. Having won the choice of place, they had selected the north side of the river, though there was really little substantial difference between the two positions. On seeing them sweep round to the start, it seemed more than ever impossible to believe that an athletic, well-mated and very strong-looking crew like this could be fairly defeated by the comparatively much smaller four of the Atalantas. The London themselves, though yet a little anxious, showed, naturally enough, an easy confidence in their own superiority, for never, perhaps, in the records of boat-racing did any set of men go to the post feeling victory more correctly pressured. Some few minutes elapsed before the Americans put off from the steamer that had brought them up from Putney, and got on board their outrigger, which lay in mid-river awaiting their arrival. As they moved up to their place, wearing red, close fitting vests with short sleeves, leaving the arms bare, and with red kerchiefs round their heads, they looked so entirely different from the form of any ordinary London boating four, that even then it was difficult to apply anything like a regular comparison between them and the four stately members of the London who lay-to awaiting their presence. In the one boat was undoubted skill and unquestionable power; in the other, a strange and untested style, and apparently much less of actual physical strength.

THE START.

For a few anxious moments of suspense, when all cheering was hushed, and all the dense crowd stood in silent expectation, the boats lay at their posts—the oars stretched forward ready for the first stroke. Clearly was heard the umpire's call, "Are you ready?" and sharply in the next instant the report of the pistol fire that was to be the signal for starting. Both boats pulled off exactly together, people on the London side believing that their crew had the start, and those on the Atalanta side believing that the Americans got off first. Any doubt on the point could have been but momentary. They started as nearly as 0¼ as could be; and before half a dozen seconds had elapsed the London in three powerful strokes had drawn to the fore, and were decidedly heading the Atalantas. Bearing slightly down toward the edge of the crowd that thronged the barges on the Surrey side the London seemed for a moment to be boring the Atalantas, while the latter, also pointing their boat in the same direction, were apparently trying to avoid any chance of a foul. All prospect of such a disaster was very speedily placed out of the range of probability, for, before a hundred yards had been covered, the London, towing forty-two strokes to the minute, were fairly clear of the rival boat, which, with the same number of shorter strokes, appeared to be doing their pulling faster than they really were. There was the same weak hold of the water, the same bare on the stroke, and, in short, all the defects which had been observed in the earlier portion of the day's practice. Strokes, in point of time, were nearly level, but the London's superiority in sweep and power told, and, securing the position of the readiest boat, steered his own across the stern of the London, and so got out of the wash without gaining any other advantage. The London, pulling a magnificent stroke, drew still further away, and before Barnes Bridge was reached had placed a clear length and a half between the stern of their boat and the stern of the Atalantas. London went under the bridge in four minutes twenty seconds, the Atalantas five seconds later. From this in going along the smooth open water of Barnes Reach, the leading crew drew still further away, and setting into a steady sweeping stroke of about forty-two strokes to the minute, and so to take the situation more easily than they had done in the first flush of the start. The Americans, making sheer arm work of it, had also reduced the rate to forty at a time when it had been supposed they would have been pulling something like forty-four. On the way down to Chiswick, amid continuous cheers from the masses of people on both sides, the London increased their lead almost perceptibly at every stroke, and rowed as easily as in a sharp training spin. Spurting up to forty-two, the Atalantas still failed to reduce the four lengths that now lay between them and the leaders. They were apparently tiring, and were obviously doing no more, or very little more, than had been observed in their training. Passing Chiswick Church, the powerful pulling of the London contrasted strongly with the light and really pretty, though very ineffective, rowing of the American four. Nine chains over, across Acton Reach, the leading crew was now becoming rapidly hopeless. Here the Atalantas, who at Barnes Bridge might have saved half a length by taking the inside arch instead of following London through the centre, again steered out a little and put on a spurt up to a good 42. But it was in vain. All the way along from Barnes to Hammersmith the London crew had gradually but surely increased the wide space between themselves and their rivals. Diminishing their rate to thirty-eight, the leading crew shot under the immense throng of spectators on Hammersmith Bridge fully ten lengths before the Atalantas reached the same point, the time being—London, 19 minutes 20 seconds; Atalanta, 12 minutes 55 seconds, or a difference of 26 seconds in favor of the London.

A "FOUL."

So far the course taken, under the extraordinary and unexpected change of the race, had been kept remarkably clear. Now, in the wide expanse between Hammersmith and Putney, shoals of small boats laden with pleasure-people were flitting about on the open water, many of them crowding thither quite near the route taken by the competing boats. Of all these the leading crew steered perfectly clear. Not so the Atalantas. As they pulled along from the bridge, still cheered by the people assembled there, a lubberly-looking coble, with half a dozen or more men and women on board, swung right in the line of the Atalanta boat. The consequence was that the blades of the American oars came in contact with the side of the jubberly coble that would not or could not get out of the way, and the American crew were completely stopped. On getting clear, after a loss of at least half a dozen more lengths, they drew away from the miserable and much excreated party in the big boat, and continued their now perfectly hopeless chase of the leaders. From the Soap Works down to the Crabtree the Atalantas still kept up forty strokes to the minute, while the London, at thirty-eight, went on increasing their long and evidently commanding lead. At the Crown Point, three hundred yards ahead, Mr. SMITH, at the bow of the Atalanta boat, looked round occasionally to see if the rival boat was within reach, and to keep clear of the craft crowding round about.

THE FINISH.

But it had long been all over. Nothing remained but for the London crew to row easily to the finish and 40 win, as they did by fully 300 yards. They pulled up at the Ancastar opposite the Bells, while the Atalantas were still struggling past SIMMOND'S boat-house, about 2½ strokes or 44 seconds behind them. The time of the race, taken by BISHOP'S chronograph, was 21 minutes 23 seconds. This was rather larger than was expected from a four so perfectly well up to the distance as the London, rowing without a coxswain, and with fair wind and tide. Had they been at all pressed the course would, doubtless, have been done in less time, though, as it was, the London rowed pretty hard from start to finish, and placed as great a distance as they conveniently could between themselves and the Atalantas. The latter were simply never in it from first to last. Their style of rowing has proved to be utterly ineffective against that adopted by the English, and nothing now is now established beyond a doubt that their best form was shown in the training, and it was all but unanimously stated by the Press, from their first appearance on the river, that they could have no possible chance if in the actual race they did not very materially improve upon their course of practice. They have to meet a singularly good crew, and, doing all that they could, they were simply outpaced from beginning to end.

An Encounter with River Thieves—The Mate of a Vessel Accidentally Shot.

At about noon yesterday two men, employed by DENSDELL & MARTIN, stevedores, after having, as is alleged, stolen a quantity of sugar from the bark Maggie Reynolds, lying at PIERPONT'S wharf, foot of Montague-street, Brooklyn, returned for some more. The second mate, SAMUEL DIXON, attempted to prevent them from getting away with a bag of sugar they had secured. The thieves made a desperate assault on DIXON, who ran into the cabin and got a pistol, which he tried to use on his assailants, and in doing so he accidentally shot W. L. SMITH, the first mate, inflicting a severe wound in the fleshy part of the thigh. The thieves made their escape. Information was conveyed to the Central Police Office, Brooklyn, and Detectives POWERS and RUGG were dispatched to look after the case. The thieves were gone, and DENSDELL & MARTIN denied all knowledge of their names or residences. The mate was taken to Dr. COLTON'S office, Montague-street, where an unsuccessful search was made for the ball, and he was then removed to the City Hospital. Built is twenty-one years of age, single, and resides in Nova Scotia. His wound is not thought to be of a dangerous character.
